The P R E F A C E.

HOW vain, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a Work of this mixture, mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolv'd me. For had it been begotten then, with my first dawn of day; when the light of common knowledge began to open itself to my younger years; and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkness of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lustily, purposed (some few fallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Island of Great Britain. I confess that it had better sort'd with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travels, to have set together (as I could) the unjointed and scattered frame of our English affairs; than of the Universal: in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured, with the desire to satisfy those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adversity; the former enforcing, the latter perswading; have caus'd me to make my thoughts legible, and my self the subject of every Opinion, wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (Fortune changing) sped much better in any Age. For Prosperity and Adversity have evermore tyed and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in Experience, That Dogs do always bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who, wanting that Virtue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especial gift of GOD, which we call Charity in Christian men; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given: led thereto by uncertain Report only; which His Majesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter: understand first, and then reform righteously. Rumor, res fine Teste, sine Judice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witness, without Judge, malicious, and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave S. Augustine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evil. And herein no man hath given a better Rule, than this of Seneca; Conscientia satisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur vel mala, dum bene mereris; Let us satisfy our own Consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame, be it never so ill, it is to be despised, so we deserve well.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my Countrey, and prized it before my private: the general acceptance can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sun-shine day to a Sea man after Shipwrack; and the contrary no other harm, than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her whom I must still honour in the dust; though further than the defence of Her excellent Person, I never persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the World, hath taken the accompt: so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parva, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them; I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own misapp in that kind; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzic, not of hope, seeing it is not Truth; but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then some possibility to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying, and extensive virtue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath cast upon slime and dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear; and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several Picture of face, and every one a divers Picture of mind; every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of Opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations: so many natural and unnatural; wise, foolish, manly, and childish affections and passions in mortal men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of Plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himself; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life, did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the Worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compas it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest: Noman can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissimble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) to change himself, but that his heart may be sometimes seen at his tongues end.

Enslit, cap. 12.
Nihil facilius
quam reprehendere alium.

In this great discord, and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnis honesti rei malus Iudex est vulgus: The common People are evil Judges of honest things, and whose wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if to the better sort; every understanding hath a peculiar judgement, by which it both censurcth other men, and valetueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I find these my worthless Papers torn with Rats; seeing the stollful Censurers of all Ages have not spared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition: the severest men to themselves, with Hypocritie; and the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of these natures, which lye in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, seeing Solomon complained long since; and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the Professors to their easie ways of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approved custome of those, who have left the memories of Time-past to after-Ages; to give, as near as I can, the same right to History which they have done. Yet, seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, that it hath given us life in our understanding, since the World it self had life and beginning, even to this day; yea, it hath triumphed over time, which, besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of years, and given so fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, The wist work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it (I say) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed; how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled; how Kings and Kingdoms have flourished and fallen, and for what virtue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkness of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our own like errors and ill-deservings. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupid minds, as to make us remember, That the Infinite Eye and Wisdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the Justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our own consciences; which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the Opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen Wisdom confess, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God: If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedness, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks much too well.

To repeat GODS Judgements in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies, would require a Volume apart: for the Sea of Examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the Earth; and their fortunes written only in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeeded, and have not seen the fall of

of others, do not fear their own faults. GODS Judgements upon the greater and greatest have been left to Posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their virtue, who have gathered the acts and ends of Men mighty and remarkable in the World. Now, to point far off, and to speak of the conversion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who have gnawn the grafs of the earth with Beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or, of that wile working of Pharaoh, when he flew the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or, of the policy of Jezabel, in covering the murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law, with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeless proof, that far-off Examples would not be left to the same far-off Respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour, practice, peril, blood-thed; and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the World have undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their Issues Masters of the World? And yet hath Babylon, Perseus, Egyptus, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no fruit, no flower, grafs, nor leaf, springing upon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots and ruines do hardly remain. Omnia que manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either overturned by the hand of man, or at length, by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diversly given by those that ground their Opinions on second causes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and foreign force, or by inward negligence and dissention, or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk down under their own weight; of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set down the date and period of every Estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my self a day over to resolve.

For seeing the first Books of the following Story, have undertaken the Discourse of the first Kings and Kingdoms: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface to travel after, and overtake far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes; who having beheld, both in divine and humane letters, the success of infidelity, injustice, and cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same pattern.

True it is, that the judgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched most with that which most nearly seemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the judgements of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long process of time, and won to give his blessing in one Age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in Ages removed far from the present, as in those of later times. And that we may see appear by evident proof, than by affirmation, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill success; I will here, by way of Preface, run over some examples, which the Work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the First. For that King, when by force, craft, and cruelty, he had disposed, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind, and destroyed his elder Brother, Robert, Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of the Land; GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above an hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the Kings dearly beloved.

To pass over the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out, and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Matiline Race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious; yet, in that he afterwards caused his own Uncle, the Earl of Kent, to die, for no other offence, than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earl as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be Treason in his Uncle, which was indeed Treason in himself, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this, I say, made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty, the secret and unfeareable Judgement of GOD, revenged on the Grandchild of Edward the Third; and so it fell out, even to the last of that Line, that in the second or third descent, they were all buried under the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the Second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he always took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those days, as others have done in these, hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves by the murder of Gloucester, died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himself (who, in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents: He was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousin-German and Vassal, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown traitorous; who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, pretending to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himself, and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he swore, that the deposed King should live. After he had enjoyed this Realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from Conspiracies and Rebellions: he law (if Souls immortal see and discern any things after the Bodies Death) his Grand-child Henry the Sixth, and his Son the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crown (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his Race, and by the Issues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd; enemies, whom, by his own practice, he supposed that he had left no less powerless, than the succession of the Kingdom questionless, by entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And, out of doubt, humane reason could have judged no otherwise, but that these cautious provisions of the Duke, seconded by the valour and signal victories of his Son Henry the Fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the despair of all re-conquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might to have judged, were not this passage of Caesaron all true; Dies, hora, momentum, horrendis dominationibus sufficit, quo Adamantius credebantur radicibus esse fundatas. A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things that seem to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now, for Henry the Sixth, upon whom the greatest storm of his Grand-father's grievous faults fell, as if formerly had done upon Richard, the Grand-child of Edward, although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet, as he refused the Daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou (by which he lost all that he had in France) (in condescending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Gloucester, the main and strong Pillar of the House of Lancaster; he drew on himself and his Kingdom the greatest joint-los and dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the Third of France, Qu'il estoit une fort gentille Prince; mais son reign eut advenu en une fort mauvais temps: That he was a very gentle Prince, but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise under the Queen had been absolute, the Queen, in respect of her personal wound, proteague injuria forme, because Gloucester disfavoured her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed, the success to the counsel. For after the cutting down of Gloucester, Turk grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his Right, both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Turk; yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain path which his Father had trodden out, deposed Henry the Father, and Edward the Son, both of their lives and Kingdom. And what was the end now of that politic Lady the Queen, other than this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers; that she lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her only Son the Prince, were hewn in funder; while the Crown was set on his head that did it? She lived to see her self deposed of her estate, and of her moveables; and lastly, her Father, by rendering up the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000 crowns for her Ransom, to become a stark Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine, but unwisdom: for other fruit hath it never yielded since the World was.

And now it came to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaster were rooted up, one only Earl of Richmond excepted; whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it self stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own presence; of which tragical Actors, there was not one that escaped the Judgement of GOD in the same kind. And he, which (besides the execution of his Brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himself had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predecessor; taught him also, by the same art, to kill his own Sons and Successors, Edward and Richard. For, these Kings which have sold the blood of others at a low rate, have but made the Market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the Fourth, succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him; who, although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own Person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her Kindred, as he easily allured them to consend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: Secondly, he wrought their consent to have them imprisoned: And lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads severed from their Bodies. And having now brought these his chief instruments to exercise that common Precept which the Devil hath written upon every Poit, namely, To deprecate those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprecate; He urged that Argument so far, and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himself, and of his Brother, could fathom the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That, whensoever the King, or his Brother, should have able years to exercise their power, they would take a most severe revenge of that careless wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sons was without suspect; and yet the Devil, who never dilwades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But, when he found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not fordable, he first resolved to kill him sitting in Council; wherein having failed with his Sword, he set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And, because nothing else could move his appetite, he caused his head to be stricken off, before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgement of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any Story. For, the self-same day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Hastings advice, executed at Smiffet; I say, Hastings himself, in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same hour, in the same lawless manner, had his Head struck off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent Oration persuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldom of Hereford for reward, besides the hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings only Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; he had his Head severed from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what success had Richard himself after all these mischiefs and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian Religion; and after such time as with a mercilefs hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords, other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood obtained at GOD's hand the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A politick Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions, both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did; I say, by his wisdom, because, as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loy the Eleventh, whom he followed in all was royal, or royal-like; but he was far more just, and begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loy did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wife; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well, that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his Subjects, he wisely put it off on those that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever, the taking off of Stanley's Head, who set the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George Duke of Clarence, shews, as the success also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first Line ended in his Grand-child, as that of Edward the Third, and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now, for King Henry the Eighth, if all the Pictures and Patterns of a mercilefs Prince were lost in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For, how many servants did he advance in haste (but for what virtue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others, of more desert, gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather Honey, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Hive? How many Wives did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age, could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the accomp^t did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to give his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt, he imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father, and executed the Earl of Surry the son; the one, whose deserting he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings service; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure; the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows, which he heaped upon the Fatherless and Widows, at home; and besides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their several Conquests; what cauleless and cruel wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the Fifth? What Laws and Wills did he devise to establish this Kingdom in his own illues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut down those Branches, which sprang from the same root that himself did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his own, without increase; though, for themselves in their several kinds, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among other women. And that blood which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffused by the Sun-shine of his grace; from whence his Majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the World were infused into one eye; yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foul spots, by which the consciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the Sword of his Justice, with which the most that forewent him have stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed; that he hath received it even from the Hand of God, and hath itaied the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That he never took revenge of any man that fought to put him beside it; That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princes did: That His Majesty entered not by breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary Gate, which his own right fet open; and into which, by a general love and obedience He was received. And howsoever His Majesty's preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559.) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; nor, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of her long Reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to God for the uniting of the Northern parts of Brittany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were severed, but by small brooks and banks, yet, by reason of the long continued War, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This, I say, it is not the least of God's blessings which His Majesty hath brought with unto this Land; No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to the height, they will appear as a Mole Hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the Historians since then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose and the White, for the greatest happiness (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from God, certainly, the peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gales, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our British Blood, heretofore, and during the difference, so often and abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdom more enabled to recover her ancient honours and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conquests. It is true, that heretofore we do not yet find the effect. But that the Duke of Parma, in the year 1588. joyned the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South-coast; and had His Majesty at the same time declared himself against us in the North, it is easie to divine what had become of the Liberty of England: certainly, we would then, without murmur, have brought this Union a far greater praise than it hath since cost us. It is true, that there was never any Common-weal, or Kingdom in the World, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings live in the World, and not above it. They are not infinite, to examine every man's cause, or to relieve every man's wants. And yet, in the later (though to his own prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own. Which, of whom it may be said, as of Solomon, Deiis Deus Solomoni Latitudinem cordis; Which, if other men do not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who, as well in divine, as in humane understanding hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of presumption, and wishal suspect, that it might befall these Papers of mine (though the lofs were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilful and common Painters, which, which, by her own commandment were knock'd in pieces, and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the Beauty of the external; and weak Writers, in describing the Vertues of the internal; do often leave to Posterity, of well formed faces, a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely minds, a most defective Representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruel and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom, for that purpose I have inserted this brief Discourse) with His Majesties temperate, revengelless, and liberal disposition; I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them justly, and with an even hand; and withall, but bestow every deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so just a cause to complain, as the King himself hath. Now, as we have told the success of the triumphs, and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Personages; so we find, that GOD is every where the same God. And, as it pleased him to punish the usurpation and unnatural cruelty of Henry the First, and of our Third Edward, in their Children for many Generations: so dealt he with the Sons of Loy Debonaire, the Son of Charles the Great, or Charlemain. For after such time as Debonaire of France had torn out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the Son of Pepin, the eldest Son of Charlemaine, and Heir of the Empire, and then caused him to die in Prison, as did our Henry to Robert his elder Brother; there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poisoning, imprisonments, and civil War; till the whole Race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himself of his Nephew by a violent death, and of his bastard Brothers by a civil death (having inclosed them with sure guard all the days of their lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition; yet God raised up against him (which he expected not) his own Sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his own Sons, with whom (to satisfy their ambition) he had thured his estate, and given them Crowns to wear, and Kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldest Son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his first Wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loy, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, that he had used violence towards his Brothers and Kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be slain. Et quod, laith the Text, fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse suscepit liberare poterat, interfecit permisit; Because he used violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slain, whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few Kings do, namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which he performed in the General Assembly of the States, it follows: Post hec autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quae in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this, he did openly confess himself to have erred, and following the Example of the Emperour Theodosius, he underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did, and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is unjustly spilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

The King, as I have said, had four Sons. To Lothaire his eldest, he gave the Kingdom of Italy, as Charlemaine his Father had done to Pepin, the Father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin, the second Son, he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine; to Loy, the Kingdom of Bavaria; and to Charles, whom he had by a second Wife, called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But his second Wife, being a mother-in-law to the rest, persuaded Debonaire, to cast his Son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to graten Charles, which, after the death of his Son Pepin, he persecuted to effect against his Grand-child bearing the same name. In the mean while, being invaded by his Son Loy of Bavaria, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead, Loy of Bavaria, and Charles, afterward called the Bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyne in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight near to Auxerre, the most bloody battel that ever was stricken in France; in which, the marvellous loss of Nobility, and men of War, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Huns to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by Treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster; Carloman rebels against his Father, Charles the Bald, the Father burns out the eyes of his Son Carloman; Bavaria invades the Emperour Lothaire, his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, he is assailed and wounded to the heart by his own conscience, for his Rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the Bald the Uncle, oppresseth his Nephews, the Sons of Lothaire, he usurpeth the Empire, to the prejudice of Loy of Bavaria, his elder Brother; Bavaria Armies, and his Son Carloman, are beaten, he dies of grief, and the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zede-chias a Jew, his Physician, his Son Loy the Begue dies of the same drink. Begue had Charles the simple, and two bastards, Loy and Carloman; they rebel against their Brother, but the eldest breaks his neck, the younger is slain by a wild Boar; the Son of Bavaria had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the gros becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany; wherewith not contented, he invades invades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Understanding; he dyes a distracted Beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Endes, Major of the Palace, then by Robert, the Brother of Endes; and lastly, being taken by the Earl of Fernandis, he is forced to dye in the Prison of Peron. Loy the Son of Charles the simple breaks his neck in chafing a Wolf; and of the two Sons of this Loy, the one dyes of poison, the other dyes in the Prison of Orleans; after whom, Hugh Capet, of another Race, and a stranger to the French, makes himself King.

The miserable ends had the Issues of Debonaire, who after he had once apparelled Injustice with authority, his Sons and Successors took up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the fame was torn from their shoulders, every man despit ed them as miserable and naked Beggars. The wretched success they had (saith a Learned Frenchman) shews, Que en cest mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice; That in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the Son of Pepin the true Heir of Charlemain, men had more meddling, than God or Justice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the First, one of the Worthiest Kings (except for that Fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himself, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol, and Cabrières, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented himself of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his Son, to do Justice upon the murderers, threatening his Son with GODS Judgements, if he neglected it. But this unreasonable care of his, God was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry was slain in sport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hendrick. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautiful and virtuous Ladies; yet were they, one after another, cast out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Mallicious upon those of the Religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crown was set on his Head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spain as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Castile, in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the Third, and the great Evan Vassilovick of Muscovy, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all the Christian and Heathen Kings, having been the most mercilefs. For, besides those of his own Blood and Nobility, which he had caused to be slain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruiz; the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis, Gonsales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Aragon, whom he cut in pieces, and cast into the streets, denying him Christian burial: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile, he made away the two Infants of Aragon his Cousin-Germans, his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Terorin, Alendes de Toledo, Gutierrez his Great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest Brethren, innocent Princes, whom after he had kept in close Prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Arch-bishop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed, of purpose to enjoy their Treasures; so did he put to death Abraham Aben Alhamar, King of Barbari, with thirty seven of his Nobility, that came unto him for succour, with a great sum of Money, to levy (by his favour) some Companies of Souldiers to return withal. Yet, he would needs assist the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother, the Earl of Afaramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their Inheritance, which, but for their Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoin, who after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Sculis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earl of gran Pre, Hector of Chartes, and (in effect) all the Officers of Justice of the Chamber of Accounts, Treasury, Requests (with sixteen others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastered France; He was soon after stricken with an Ax in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and without any leisure to repent his mis-deeds, presently slain. These were the lovers of other mens miseries: and miseries found them out.

Now, for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the Seventh, Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Aragon, was the first, and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himself to hold Ara- gon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdom of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his Wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Niece, the Daughter of his own Niece out of the Kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promise he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick, Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Blood, and by double alliance tyed unto him; sold them to the French; and with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wife and politic King, who sold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son the Prince of Spain, the greatest Monarch of the World; saw him dye in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest Daughter married unto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugal, beheld her first Husband break his neck in her presence, and being with child by her second, dyed with it. A just Judgement of God upon the Race of Alphonso, now wholly extinguished; who had not only left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slain with his own hand, the Son and only comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrice, Dutches of Viseu. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and dyed mad, and deprived. His third Daughter, bestowed on King Henry the Eighth, he saw cast off by the King; the Mother of many troubles in England; and the Mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeal, shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French, and dyed heart broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdoms of Ferdinand have Masters of a new name; and by a strange Family are governed and possessed.

Charles the Fifth, Son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vain enterprises upon the French, upon the Almans and other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were consumed; who gave the while a most perilous entrance to the Turks, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a fort, out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insburg; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice, having hope to swallow up all those Dominions; wherein he concocted nothing, save ground in either. He crept into a Cloyster, and made himself a Prisoner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the year, to his Son Philip, from whom he very slowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand, (wrested by his Ancestors from Jacqueline, their lawful Princess) and to possess in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands; perswaded by that mischievous Cardinal of Granville, and other Romish Tyrants; not only forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperor, by the Nobility of those Countreys, not only forgot the Present made him upon his entry of forty Millions of Florents, called the Novelle aid; nor only forgot that he had twice most solemnly sworn to the General States, to maintain and preserve their ancient Rights, Privileges, and Customs, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, Conditional Princes of those Provinces; but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, by strong hand and main force, attempted to make himself not only an absolute Monarch over feet all their Natural and Fundamental Laws, Privileges, and ancient Rights; but Turk-like, to tread under his after he had easily obtained from the Pope a dispensation of his former Oaths (which Dispensation was the true cause of the War and Bloodshed since then,) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his base Sister Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinal Granville; He employed that most mercilefs Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of strange Nations; by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captain, the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Guevre; and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn; made away Montigne, and the Marquels of Bergues, and cut off in those fix years (that Alva Governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thousand and six hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous wished ends, having it in his hope to work that by subtilty which he had failed to perform by force. He sent for Governour, his bastard Brother, Don John of Austria, a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But he using the same Papal advantage that his Predecessors with the General States; and to discharge the Low-Countreys of all Spaniards, and other strangers therein garrisoned; Towards whose Pay and Passport, the Netherlands trained themselves to make a payment of six hundred thousand pounds. Which Moneys received, he suddenly surprised the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemmes; nor doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to have possessed himself of all the mastering places of those Provinces. For whatsoever he overtly pretended, he held in secret a contrary counsel with the Secretary Escovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Ministers of the Spanish Tyranny formerly practised, and now again intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Duke's cruelties. First, for himself, after he had murdered so many of the Nobility; executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in six years, and most cruelly slain Man, Woman, and Child in Mecklin, Zutphen, Narden, and other places; and after he had consumed six and thirty Millions of Treasure in six years, notwithstanding his Spanish vaunt, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs, He departed the Country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and deceleration of the whole Nation; leaving His Majesty's Affairs in a ten-fold worse estate than he found them at his first arrival. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himself overcame the greatest difficulties: though his judgement were over-weak to manage the least: What wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealousy and distrust, with the untimely death that seized on him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Escovedo his sharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Master, both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spain upon some new project, he was at his first arrival, and before any access to the King, by certain Ruffians, appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spain's carriage, his counsel and success in this business, there is nothing left to the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thousand Christians, for the loss of all those Countreys, which for beauty, gave place to none; and for revenue, did equal his West-Indies; for the loils of a Nation which most willingly obeyed him; and who, at this day, after forty years War, are, in despite of all his forces, become a free Estate, and far more rich and powerful than they were, when he first began to impoverish and oppress them.

Oh! by what plots, by what for-livings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures; poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politick subtilty, have these fore-named Kings, both strangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent Ministers! and in the end have brought those things to pass for their enemies, and seen an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded; if no such opposition had ever been made. GOD hath said, and performed it ever: Perdam sapientiam sapientum; I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead; seeing the world is the same that it hath been; and the children of the present time, will still obey their Parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the World are exercised. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawful; and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our selves; or perfwade our selves, that GOD hath given us Letters Patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a Non obstantes; so we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joynted to earth; we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, far off, and unsearchable; we have sense and feeling of corporal things; and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are also earthly; and it is less to be wondered at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them from seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For, as the Prophet Esay cried out long ago, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Esay complained then for himself and others: so are they less believed, every day after other. For, although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in every mans mouth, yea, in the discourse of every woman, who, for the greatest number are but Idols of Vanity; what is it other than an universal diffimulation? We profess that we know GOD, but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life; for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitude non est divinum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly, there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personal hatred, and the perpetual war, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians, the discourse whereof hath occupied the World, as it hath well near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soon resolve, that took knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven; and that the World it self were but used as it ought, and as an Inn, or place wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our Celestial habitation? when on the contrary, besides the Discourse and outward profession, the Soul hath nothing but hypocrisy. We are all (in effect) become become Comedians in Religion; and while we act in gesture and voice, divine virtues, in all the course of our lives, we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in terms, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Solomon defineth to be the School-Mistress of the Knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the World; it is enough that we give it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtain honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we still shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future; and yet, when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we ourselves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability, that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the use: When goods increase (saith Solomon) they also increase that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in fair weather; they again forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steer away from Examples, I will take but one out of Master Danvers, and use his own words: whilst the Emperor Charles the Fifth, after the resignation of his estate, stayed at Ulloching for winds, to carry him his last journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embassador, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius should depart; the Emperor calling some one of his servants, and no body answering him (for those that attended upon him, were gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperor took up the Candle himself, and went before Seldius, to light him down the Stairs; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the Stairs foot, he said thus unto him; Seldius, thou hast known in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of Soldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea, even of his own servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of God, which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first is, the reverend respect that is held of Great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their Justice and Piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which, what is the applause of the multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who without the knowledge rare to distinguish Virtue and Fortune; the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most virtuous (if unpromising) have ever been despised. For, as Fortunes and on foot, the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base Groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The second is, the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them which Laetantius spake of certain Heathen Philosophers; Quod sapientes sunt in re stulti. For, when our spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortal bodies, and disposed by GOD; there remaineth in them no other joy Wall of a King's Palace, nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame etiam corum filii, quia anima mortuorum rebus viventium non interstunt; The dead, though no more holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children; for the Souls of those departed, are not conversant with their affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our Sons shall be honourable; neither shall we understand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saith he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all; for who can shew unto man, what shall be after him that die, but He therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travel in the Son? not knowing after death, whether a fool or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof, which made me (saith he) endeavour even to abhor, mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowful estates after death, God hath reserved? Mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Esay confesseth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us Job 14: 21; Eccles. 9: 5; Eccles. 9: 6; Eccles. 9: 7; Eccles. 9: 8; Eccles. 9: 9; again receive Organs glorified, and incorruptible, the seats of Angelical affections; in so great admiration shall the Souls of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or less joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection towards Friends, Kindred, or Children. Of whom, whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them, no man can assure us; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a divine life remain any of those faculties, which the Soul exercised in a mortal body; we shall not at that time to divide the joys of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the World. No, be their estates greater than ever the World gave, we shall (by the difference known unto us) even detect their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remain of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firm Faith, for which it pleased the Infinite Mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unnecessary and vain? Certainly, no. For that Infinite Wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees; which hath given greater and less light and beauty to heavenly bodies; which hath made differences between Beasts and Birds; created the Eagle and the Eagle, the Cedar, and the Shrub; and among Stones, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people; Magistrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And, as Honour is left to Posterity, for a mark and ensign of the virtue and understanding of their Ancestors; so (seeing Siracides preferred Death before Beggary; and that Titles, without proportionable estates, fall under the miserable succour of other mens pity) I account it foolishness to condemn such a care. Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our own buildings out of other mens ruins. For, as Plato doth first prefer the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quasitas: so Jeremy cries, wo unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousness, and their chambers without equity; And Ezay the same, Wo to those that spoil, and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of violence; not to lye in wait for blood; and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet; for such are the ways (saith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And, if we could afford our selves but to much leisure, as to consider, That he which hath most in this world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it; and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, seeing it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever; I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being; and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending; coveting those mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves, after the World, were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger esteem all negligent, that have not trodden down their opposites; the Politician all gross, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet, when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, and when, by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end; Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty to others; and it is only then, that we are stricken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That God will not be mocked. For if, according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his Angels; where shall those appear, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerful God were given but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the found of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad eternos labores & bella descendunt! I confess, that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it said, That we ended well; for we all desire (as Balaam did) to dye the death of the righteous. But, what shall we call a disesteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if those men do not oppose him, disesteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For, what do they otherwise, that dye this kind of well-dying, but say unto God, as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that thou wilt the falsehoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishness. For I shall prejudice my Son (which I am resolved not to do) if I make restitution; and confess my self to have been unjust (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood, such a Leaden One, as Lewis the Eleventh wore on his Cap; which, when he had caused any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head, and kiss it; beseeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when, by the practice of a Cardinal, and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earl of Armagnac to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed, fit to be used, towards a Leaden, but not towards the Ever-living, GOD. But of this composition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is duple and ridiculous; they fear the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings; they fear the Opinions of men, which beat but upon shadows; they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they Friends or Kings; yea, they dive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble-stone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerful hand; and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour against the terrible judgments of the All-powerful God; yea, they shew themselves Gods against God, and Slaves towards men; towards men, whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now, for the rest; If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppressed, whom we account wretched; we shall find the happiness of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to entrenchance (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speediest uprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail it self. For, there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next hour, or day to come. Quid vesper verbat, incertum est; what the evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (saith S. James) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set up, and to morrow he shall not be found; for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the air which compasseth adversity, be very obscure; yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those under the cross, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For, be it that we have lived many years, and according to Solomon in them all we have rejoiced; or be it that we have measured the same length of dayes, and therein have evermore sorrowed; yet, looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other; to wit, the joy and wo, failed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us, and hold us in chase, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid statui retro est, mors tenet; whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So, as whosoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a servant, and the Time a friend; let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what he hath relieved; either of Beauty and Youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might lift, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad sighs. He shall find nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing youth, overtake it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither; in so much as looking back from the very instant time, and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains, as he, that is most blessed in common Opinion, hath of his fore-past pleasure and delights. For whatsoever is cast behind us, is just nothing; and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it: Omnia qua eventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except, who, having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear, and embrace both, as necessary guides to endless glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life are but of two sorts; whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other to the World. In the first, we complain to GOD against our selves, for our offences against him; and confess, Et justificus in omnibus qua venerunt super nos; And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second, we complain to our selves against GOD; as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites; or for taking them from us having had them; forgetting that humble and just acknowledgement of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which, S. Paul hath promised blessedness; to the second, death. And out of doubt, he is either a fool, or ingrateful to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him; or doth not acknowledge, how sharp soever his afflictions be, that the same are yet far less, than those which are due unto him. And if an Hea-then wife man call the adversities of the World but tribula vivendi, the tribunes of living; a wife wife Christian man ought to know them, and bear them as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and resolutely, and not as those whining Souldiers do, Qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their distribution, been partial to the most mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable Beggar; a Beggar, begging Water of an Enemy to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Seigneur of the Turks in the morning, and in the same day, the Foolish of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also played, being taken by Sapores) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Captain, and lastly, the part of a blind Beggar; of which, examples of many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly, there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous World, than to resolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the less. For, when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now, if any man out of weaknefs prize the passages of this world otherwife (for, saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem à sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the brains of Man all the miseries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they work. For, seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnes in the shipwrack of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortune succumbere, quod tristis est omni fato; To fall under Fortune, of all other the most miserable destiny.

But it is now time to found a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit; and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things, to wit, Creation. For, though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implyeth the other; Creation inferreth Providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten;) and Providence presupposeth Creation; Yet many of those that have seemed to excel in worldly wisdom, have gone about to dis-joyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now, although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for, by Faith, we understand that the world was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verbal Doctrine; yet that the necessity of Infinite power, and the Worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgement of Natural reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no less strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the rest) have so retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of Truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those Philosophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned, either for phantastical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubtedly Grounds and Principles indeed, because so called? Or, that ipsi discernunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much less barter it down: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamental Law of humane knowledge. For, saith Charron, in his Book of Witdom, Tout proposicion humaine a autant d'autorité quel autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equal authority, if reason make not a difference: the rest, being but the Fables of Principles. But hereof, how shall the upright and impartial judgement of man give a Sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And, to this purpose, it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adiungunt, qui sine ullo iudicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pendunt more ducuntur; They neglect their own wisdom, who without any judgement approve the invention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulcnes, ignorance is now become so powerful a Tyrant, as it hath let true Philosophy, Physick and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my self, I shall never be persuaded, that God hath shut up all the light of Learning within the Lanthorn of Aristotle's brains; or, that it was ever said unto him, as unto Esdras, Accendam

Accendam in corde tuo Lucernam intellectus; That God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they only invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature having confuted all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That theie, and theie, be the causes of theie and theie effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reason; and so hath Experience without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that fowre Rennet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But, if we ask a reason of this cause, why the fowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it; and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this, and many other like vulgar questions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grains under his feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are far less noble Creatures than himself; who is far more noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Solomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the World, as he no sooner begins to learn; than to dye; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his own Soul, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else doth know, but GOD that created it (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will disable GOD, power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Moors of the Air for a cause, call the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of Form; and lastly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternal; which latter Opinion Aristotle, to make himself the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World; and his Sectators have maintained it; Parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur Philosophorum animis invictis opinionibus tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose Opinions are exquisitely gathered by Stenachus Engubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, One Eternal and Infinite Being, to be the Parent of the Universal: *Horum omnium sententia quævis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut providentiam unam esse consentiant: sive enim Natura, sive Æther, sive Ratio, sive Mens, sive Fatalis Necessitas, sive divina Lex, idem est quæ à nobis dicitur Deus; All these mens Opinions (saith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this; That Last; they agree upon one Providence, whether the same be Nature, or Light, or Reason, or Understanding, or Destiny, or divine Ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the World, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings, though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; do at last find, and fall into, the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philosophical contemplation and curiosity, in the necessity of this Infinite power, all the reason of Man ends and dissolves it self.*

As for others: and first touching those which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternal, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente; the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mibi videtur quod hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere; They seem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune; inasmuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had never been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Universal. For, were the Matter or Chaos eternal, it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it self to God, or God accommodate himself to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans Will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of matter, which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise; I would gladly learn how it came to pass, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent, and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no less, than served to receive the form of the Universal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient, then must it be granted, That God cleared out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the World: Or, had there been more of this matter than sufficed, then God did dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable Soul confess, That it is the same work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the same Art and Power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternal matter, be again again changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiottum. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not; at which time of not being, it is cause enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus; There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do bodies compound themselves.

For the rest, Those that feign this matter to be eternal, must of necessity confess, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form; but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part, whoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternal deformity, or in eternal dead matter, than in eternal light, and eternal life; let eternal death be his reward. For, it is a madness of that kind, as watchmen terms to express it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow: quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form; yea, for as many worlds (as if such had been Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation than the work-mans will. Yea, Reason it self finds it more cause for Infinite power, to deliver from it self a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and dust, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words: Deum in una existentia omnia præbuit; et again, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod videt, & quod non videt; to wit, causæ alter, or in better terms, non tantum formas, sed tantum causa universalis. Neither hath the World Universal closed up all of G O D: For the most part of his works (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his Wisdom be opened by the glorious work of the World; which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldom entitle G O D The All-showing, or The All-willing; but the Allmighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, infer the Worlds eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternal being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [Nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Natural Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor, Aristotle himself confesseth, Quod omnes Antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum: That all the Ancients decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite; and a little after, more largely, and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia completi ac regere: it is strange, that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falsely; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For, if we compare the World Universal, and all the unmeasurable Orbs of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipsum infinitum, it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore, Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the World Universal, but, particulam Universalis & infinitatis; a parcel of that which is the Universality, and the Infinity is self: And Plato, but a shadow of God. But the others, to prove the Worlds eternity, ureth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the World universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the World (to wit, an Almighty God) in his Antecedent; and the same God to be a God restrained in his Conclusion; to make God free in power, and bound in will, able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding, which cannot but work, matter being present: As Fire, to burn things combustible. Again, he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work, if it afterwards work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act: But God (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being always the same, doth always work. Whence he concludeth, If the World were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof; and therefore eternal. The answer to this is very easie; For that Gods performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him.

For

For the same action of his will, which made the World for ever, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it self sufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be said to be eternal; which the Platonicks call Spiritualium mundum; and do in this fort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. *Spiritualis est mundus, mundus hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vixit aequali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decessit jam ab officio ex parte una, quia non fuit semper: retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus: That representative, or the intentional word (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first work of G O D, was equally antient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This material world, the second work or creature of G O D, doth differ from the worker in this, that it was not for everlasting; and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confess: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shall be a new Heaven, and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue; though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporal effect; Touching which point, Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded Essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissolvable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity; and that the Worlds natural appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and understanding divine; and that this virtue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material World is not all together; but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.*

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it shall have any end, and to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never seen, never felt, nor, not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appear any way the older by continuance, or in any fort otherwise than they were; which had been subject to final corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newness, and that they have not continued so long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive answer by conjectures; it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Pliny, Strabo, Bedæ, Aquinas, and Arif. Met. 2. others, were grossly mistaken; or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sun's heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions so scituate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of Deluges; and how that in the time of Phæton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Suns violent heat.

But in a word, this Observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter mouldring and friable, have stood two or three thousand years; that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration, either of substance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alterations should we look for in Celestial and Quintessential bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by who's help all creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest World had, nor Mighty Men, such as the elder World had; but all things in general are reputed of less vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Discourse, we might easily fetch store of proof; as well that this World shall at length have end, as that once it had a beginning.

And I see no good Answer that can be to this Objection: If the World were eternal, why not all things in the World eternal? If there were no first, no Cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more rational than every other Nature; Why had not the eternal reason of Man, provided for his eternal Being in the World? For, if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why should Heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of Men rot and dye?

The Preface.

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Centre, and gave order that it should hang in the Air; that the Sun should travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor fail to perform that Progress once in every year; the Moon to live by borrowed light; the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like nails in a Cart-wheel; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or, if none of these had power over other; was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within those two Circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this course in all eternity; He may justly be called eternal Charity, and everlasting Love. The flame may be said of all the Stars, who being all of them most large and clear fountains of virtue and operation, may also be called eternal Vertues; the Earth may be called eternal Patience; the Moon, an eternal Borrower, and Beggar; and Man, of all other the most miserable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But instead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and confined; themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit Every thing hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now, for Nature : As by the ambiguity of this name, the School of Aristotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and fought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World ; so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotle's Physics, or primo de Celo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysics, I say, that the best is but nominal, and serving only to difference the beginning of Natural motion from Artificial : which yet the Academicks open better ; when they call it, A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soul of the World ; who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providencia (by which they understand GOD) Dux & Caput ; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodeunt ; Natura postremum. But be it what it will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all ; yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of Laërtianus, is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem facienti habet, aut scientiam ; He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus : Potest ubique Natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materiis, opera facere ; sublata vero mediolorum materiarumque diversitate, vel unicum, vel simillimum operatur; neque potest quando adest materia non operari : It is the power of Nature by diversity of means, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things ; but taking away the diversity of means, and the diversity of matter, it then works but one or the like work ; neither can it but work, matter being present . Now, if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to work all thele variable works of Heaven and Earth, it had then both understanding and will ; it had counsel to begin ; reason had been bur one and the same, all of the manner of Heaven ; or all of the matter of Earth . And , if we grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsel, this reason, and power : Cur natura potius quam Deus nominetur ? Why should we then call such a cause a Nature, than God & God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to divine power : Omnes homines naturam esse non habent, omneque summum locum reison in man (where there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power . Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his que sunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea que vere sunt, & semper eadem : True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

For the rest ; I do also account it not the meaneſt, but an impietie, monſtrous, to confound God and Nature ; be it but in terms. For it is God, that only diſpoſeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, vessels of honour and diſhonour : It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all ; it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that good doth unto all, knowing and loving the good it doth. It is Nature that ſecondarily doth all good, but it neither knoweth, nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himſelf ; Nature nothing in it ſelf. It is God which is the Father, and hath begotten all things ; it is Nature which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth ; for by it ſelf it exiſteth not. For, ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards

towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in Fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these; by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore, seeing all things work as they do (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you please) yet, because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; and by a faculty, infused by the supremest power; we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder; and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it self, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the virtue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfections. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit; That there is a power Infinite, and eternal (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith and Reason; without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by divine Letters, as the waters of a running River do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

Thus much, I say, it is, that Reason it self hath taught us; and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Ratio sequitur; quia primus est Deus scire, consequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows; because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience, Plato calleth ablati boni scientiam, the Science of the absolute good: And another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (faith is fide) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and example is perswaded: Fides nequaquam vi exoritur, sed ratione & exemplo suadetur. I confess it is, That to enquire further, as of his fecrer judgement, and the causes, is not an affect of Reason; Sed cum ratione infansium; but; and they grow much with reason, that enquire after it: For, as it is no shame nor dishonour (faith a French Authour) de faire ardeur au bon homme naître surpasse; for a man to reit himself there, where he finds it impossible to pass further: so whatsoever standing it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a cessity teach us (Reason, which is pari divini spiritus in corpore humanum me) that the World was made by a Power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and the seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

I have been already over-long, to make any large Discourse, either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuse; especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grosslest, the unfaulter division of the Books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first Part finished. All men know, that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little, ipsi nobis fatis lubentior; nam. We are tollen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But proof, though a late good Writer, make himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable Ignorant. Those that are the best men of War, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do always keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from their selves; from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally, concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counsel from the Argument. For of the Affyrans, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the first Part; and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Posterity; some few enterprises, greater in Fame than Faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before Olympiad, that overcame the confuming disease of Time; and preserved it self from the very Cradle and beginning to this day; and yet not so entire, but that the large Discourses thereof (to which, in many Scriptions, we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the Actions of whole Kings and Princes which thut up here and there in the same Time, I am driven to relate by way of digression; of which we may say with Virgil:

The Preface.

*Apparent rarities in gurgite vasto ;
They appear here and there, floating in the great gulf of Time.*

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us ; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws ; they had their diversity of Government ; they had Kingly rule ; Nobility ; Policy in War ; Navigation, and all, or the most of needful Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a general History we should have left a great deal of Nakedness by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have also made many others ; which, if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of humane error. For, seeing we digress in the ways of our lives ; yea, seeing the life of Man is nothing else but digression ; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the kinds.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman, Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles, and every day preach'd unto us. But we still make large digressions ; yea, the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found : it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire ; whilst it so flourished, that the affairs of the Nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the Fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians, as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Mædes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empire, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement : it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers ; who seldom give names to these small Brooks, whereof many joyned together, make great Rivers ; till such time as they become united, and run in main stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, and the Style not every where like it self ; the first shows their legitimation and true Parent, the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Elogues, crastili avena, used stronger pipes, when he founded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first Book, and elsewhere, in which language others may think, and my self acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant ; but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in Latine Characters in S. Senensis ; and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say, I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, having had an even years leisure to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other Tongue ; Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own Times, having been permitted to draw water as near the Well-head as another. To this I answer, That whosoever in writing a modern History, shall follow Truth too near the heels, it may haply strike out his Teeth. There is no Mistress or Guide that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself ; and he that walks after her at a middle distance, I know not whether I should call that kind of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens Opinions, when I might have made the best use of them ; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, do yet (when Death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest Times ; wherein also, why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and tax the Vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead ; and have it laid to my charge ? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly, if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find find fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For, I protest before the Majesty of God, that I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is, to please all ; seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I : Unus mihi pro populo eras : and to the same effect, Epicurus, Hic ego non multis, sed tibi ; (or as it hath since lamentably fallen fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince, Henry, the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleased him to permit some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiss. It is now left to the World without a Master ; from which, all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks : Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus : hic exitus est omnis judicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these Discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably ; so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already ; and therefore have not far to fall ; and for rising again, as in the Natural privation, there is no recession to habit ; so it is seldom seen in the privation politick. I do therefore forbear to stile my Readers, Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions, or to promise a second and third Volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough ; and too much : and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never so many courteous Phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fools, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have, lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise ; I should hardly have had this leisure to have made my self a Fool in Print.

The

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the first Book of the first Part of the History of the W O R L D.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation and Preservation of the W O R L D.

§. I. That the Invisible God is seen in his Creations.

§. II. That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

§. III. Of the meaning of in Principio, Genesis 1. ver. 1.

§. IV. Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth] Gen. 1. 1.

§. V. That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the attributes of Unform and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI. How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moveth upon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII. Of the light created, as the material substance of the Sun; and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and what annexed unto it.

§. VIII. Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

§. IX. A conclusion, repeating the sum of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The Creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

§. X. That nature is no Principium per se; nor form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

§. XI. Of Fate, and that the Stars have great influence: and that their operation may diversify be prevented or furthered.

§. XII. Of Providence.

§. XIII. Of Providence.

§. XIV. Of Predestination.

§. XV. Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation; and of Gods rest.

§. I. Of the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II. Of the intellectual mind of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sin.

§. III. Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal soul.

§. IV. Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V. That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our morality.

§. VI. Of the free power which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himself.

§. VII. Of Gods creating, to create any more; and of the cause thereof, because the universal created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I. That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no marvel that men should err.

§. II. A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III. That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IV. Why it should be needful to intend diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V. That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise; nor caused Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.

CHAP. VI.

9. VI. That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought, making the Ocean to be the Fountain of those four Rivers.

9. VII. Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Adon, and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the air.

9. VIII. Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

9. IX. Of the change of the names of places; and that besides that Eden in Cœlophryia, there is a Country in Babylon once of this name, as is proved out of Elay 37. and Ezech. 27.

9. X. Of divers other testimonies of the land of Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

9. XI. Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

9. XII. Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soils, as it is certain that Eden was such.

9. XIII. Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

9. XIV. Of the River Gehon, and the land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

9. XV. A Conclusion by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

1. That the Tree of Life was a material tree; and in what sense it is to be taken, that Adam by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.

9. II. Of Beccanus his opinion, that the tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

9. III. Of Beccanus his not unwittily allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

9. IV. Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sin.

CHAP. V.

Of divers Memorable things between the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

9. I. Of the cause and revenge of Cains sin: and of his going out from God.

9. II. Of Cains dwelling in the land of Nod, and of his City Enoch.

9. III. Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

9. IV. Of the diversities in the Age of the Patriarchs, when they began their children.

9. V. Of the long lives of the Patriarchs: and of some of late memory.

9. VI. Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

9. VII. Of the men of War before the Flood.

9. VIII. That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also divers in later times.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

9. I. That in old corruptions we may find some signs of more ancient truths.

9. II. That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

9. III. That in process of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the gross Superstitions of the Egyptians.

9. IV. That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented, and that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

9. V. Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and also the strange storie of the third.

9. VI. Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some yet, some affected the name of gods.

9. VII. That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

9. VIII. That Heathensims, and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

9. IX. Of the last refuges of the Devil, to maintain his Kingdom.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

9. I. Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

9. II. Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

9. III. Of Deucalions Flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood; nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any universal Flood.

9. IV. Of some other Records testifying the universal Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

9. V. That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been foreseen by the Stars.

9. VI. That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universal Flood: and what are Catastrophe Cœli, Gen. 7. 11.

9. VII. Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

9. VIII. Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made; the matter, fashion and name.

9. IX. That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

9. X. That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucalus) between the East Indies and Scythia.

9. I.

A Preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

9. II.

9. II. Approposul of the common opinion, That the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

9. III. The first argument against the common opinion: That they came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

9. IV. The second Argument, That the Eastern people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

9. V. The third Argument; From the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East-Indies.

9. VI. The fourth Argument; From divers considerations in the person of Noah.

9. VII. Of the senseless opinion of Annius the Commenter upon Berosus, That the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; and yet upon Gordicia, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

9. VIII. The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

9. IX. An answer to the objection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence up in the face of the whole Earth.

9. X. An answer to an objection from the name Ararat taken for Armenia, and the height of the Hills there.

9. XI. Of Caucalus, and divers far higher Hills than the Armenian.

9. XII. Of divers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

9. XIII. Of the contrary situation of Armenia unto a place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel, that the same edge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should be called Ararat.

9. XIV. Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountains Caucalus, and toward the East-Indies, and of other excellencies of the soil.

9. XV. The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japheth, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

9. I. Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japheth.

9. II. Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction; and that the known Lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

9. III. Of the Isles of the Genites in Japheths portion: of Berosus his too speedily seating Gomer the son of Japheth in Italy; and another of Japheths sons Tubal, in Spain: and also of the antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

9. IV. Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Melch. seated first about Asia the less, out of Ezech. 38. 39.

9. V. Against the fabulous Berosus, his Fictions, that the Italian Jun was Noah.

9. VI. That Gomer also, and his son Togorma, of the posterity of Japheth, were first seated about Asia the less: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe, and Northward into Samaria.

9. VII. Of Javan the fourth son of Japheth; and of Melch of Aram, and Melch of Japheth.

9. VIII. Of Altanez and Riphath, the two elder sons of Gomer.

9. IX. Of the four sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharhis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

9. X. That the seat of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia; and of strange Fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

9. I.

Of Joseph his Tale of an Ethiops, wife to Moses; grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.

9. II. A dispute against the Tale of Joseph.

9. III. Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia. Ezek. 29. 10.

9. IV. Another place of Ezekiel, chap. 30. vers. 9. in like manner mistaken.

9. V. A place, Esa. 18. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

9. VI. That upon the like mistaking, both Tethaka, in the Story of Sennacherib, and Zera, in the Story of Aha, are unadvisedly made Ethiopsians.

9. VII. A farther expostion of the place, Esa. 18. 1.

9. XI. Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

9. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sons of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

9. II. Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptian Lunar years, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.

9. III. Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

9. IV. Against Petereus, That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred years after the Creation: at least, that both 9, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

9. V. Of some other reasons against the opinion of Petereus.

9. VI. Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. ver. ult. whereupon Petereus grounded his opinion.

9. VII. A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phu, another son of Ham, which peopled Libya.

9. XII. Of the eleven sons of Canaan, the fourth son of Ham.

9. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleven sons.

9. II. Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

9. III. Of the Ishubites and Amorites.

 ||. V. Of Ophir, one of Joctans sons, and of Peru : and of that voyage of Salomon.
 ||. VI. Of Havilah the son of Joctan, who also passed into the East Indies : and of Melha, and Sopher, named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan : with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the World.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I. Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of Families to Regal, and from Regal absolute to Regal tempered with Laws.
 §. II. Of the three commendable sorts of Governments, with their opposites : and of the degrees of humane society.
 §. III. Of the good Government of the first Kings.
 §. IV. Of the beginning of Nobility : and of the vain want thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

§. I. That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Sovereign Lord : and that his beginning seems to have been of just authority.
 §. II. That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.
 §. III. That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive : and that it is probable out of Esa. 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

§. IV. Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.
 §. V. That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times : and of Vexoris of Egypt ; and of Tarsais of Scythia.
 §. VI. Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affixed unto it.
 §. VII. Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.
 §. VIII. Of the Wars of Ninus : and lastly, of his War against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts : and of divers kinds of Magick.

§. I. That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventor of Astrology, or of Magick : and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.
 §. II. Of the name of Magia : and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.
 §. III. That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned ; though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.
 §. IV. That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not justify all their practices.
 §. V. The abuse of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.
 §. VI. Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magick.
 §. VII. Of divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.
 §. VIII. That none was ever raised from the dead, by the power of the devil : and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Book of the first Part of the History of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham : and of the use of this question, for the orderings, of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I. Of some of the Successors of Semiramis : with a brief transition to the question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.
 §. II. A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in the year. 352.
 §. III. The answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Meloporamia into Canaan, and it, after his fathers death.
 §. IV. The answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.
 §. V. The answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest son : and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.
 §. VI. That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest : together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was the eldest son of Terah.
 §. VII. A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides : with an admonition, that they which shorn the times, make all ancient fables the more improbable.

§. VIII. A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.
 §. IX. That Amraphel, one of the four Kings who Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninus the son of Ninus.
 §. X. Of Arioch another of the four Kings : and that Elias, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Celofyria, and Arabia Petraea.
 §. XI. Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.
 §. XII. That Chedorlaomar, the chief of the four Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia : and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.
 §. XIII. That it is not unprobable, that the four Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, &c. or retained the names of the Countries whence they came : which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninus, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I. A Brief of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt : with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.
 §. II. That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the year after the Flood 191.
 §. III. That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather successions of Regent ; oft-times many under one King.
 §. IV. Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Ofiris.
 §. V. Of the time when Ofiris reign ended : and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the son of Ofiris.
 §. VI. Of Tiphon, Hercules Egyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostrices, successively reigning after Mizraim : and of divers errors about the former Sesostrices.
 §. VII. Of Busiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites : and of his successor Queen Thermutis, that took no Moles out of the water.
 §. VIII. Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis : and what King it was under whom Moses was born : and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I. Of the time of Moses birth : and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.
 §. II. Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. VII. Of the written Law of God.

§. VIII. Of the unwritten Law of God given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

§. IX. Of the Moral, judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a Note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

§. X. A proposal of nine other points to be considered: with a touch of the five first.

§. XI. Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

§. XII. Of the rest of the points proposed.

§. XIII. Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

§. XIV. If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written, and unwritten.

§. XVI. That only the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what sort.

CHAP. V.

§. X. The Town of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sacked by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise: wasts the Country about: and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. Philip offers to make war against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again: and provides against the enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes join with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the war.

§. XI. The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them and his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Atalus and the Roman fleet.

§. XII. Villius the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect: War of the Gauls in Italy. An Embassy of the Romans to Carthage, Massinissa and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom, and T. Quintus Flavius is sent against him.

§. XIII. The Romans begin to make war by Negotiation. T. Quintus wins a passage against Philip. Theffally wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into league with the Romans.

§. XIV. The battle at Cynoscephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintus.

§. XV. T. Quintus falls out with the Ætolians, and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions, upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Roman quarrel with Antiochus.

CHAP. V.

The wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

§. I. What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemy reigned in Asia and Egypt, before Antiochus the Great.

§. II. The beginning of the great Antiochus his reign. Of Ptolemy Evergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Malo: an expedition of Antiochus against him: The recontinuance of Antiochus his Egyptian war, with the passages between the two Kings: The victory of Ptolemy, and peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians: somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the great Alexander.

§. III. The lewd reign of Ptolemy Philopator in Egypt: with the tragical end of his favourite, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolemy Epiphanes, the son of Philopator. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once: his voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly view to him, intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

§. IV. The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their war with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus: The Ætolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace deny'd to Antiochus by the Romans.

§. V. Of the long wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Maffaniffa to the Carthaginians; that sue unto the Romans for justice in vain.

§. VI. The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis to war upon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besieges Cythum, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in his advantage of ground; whereby he utterly vanquished Nabis. Antiochus being deny'd peace by the Romans, joins with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprize Demetrius; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

§. VII. Antiochus perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Ætoliens, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors; and the Arians: with the civil answer of Titus to their discourses, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired peace between the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminder, and an idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsel in vain. Some towns won in Thessaly, the King retires to Chalcis where he married a young wife, and revels away the rest of Winter, upon the coming of the Roman Consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Arians kept the Straights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten and flies into Asia, leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

§. VIII. Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants large truce to the Ætoliens, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Much troublesome business by Sea, and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdom: with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handful of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia, where Antiochus most earnestly desires peace, and is denied it. The battel of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio after a most sumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiaticque, as his brother was sited, The African.

§. IX. Tho Ætoliens and Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other Objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyl's Prophecies; the Book of Hermes; and that inscription Simon Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

§. I. The condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the war with Antiochus was finished, the Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonians being unready for war, obtain peace at Rome, by his son Demetrius; of whom therefore he becomes jealous.

§. II. The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

§. III. Philip making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own Subjects. His Negotiations with the Bactaræ: His cruelty. He suspected his son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his Brother Perseus: and shortly after slain by his Fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent, and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

§. IV. How the Bactaræ fell upon Dardanis. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Maffaniffa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perseus. They allow not their confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of Warring upon him.

§. V. How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemns his enemies the Rhodians, with the causes thereof. The unusual stoutness of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes, the brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War against him, and send him defiance, other things concerning the justice of this War.

§. VI. The Romans sollicit the Greeks to join with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timorousness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with the hope of peace. His force. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistance the Romans had in this war. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had, but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his victory, sees for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worst in a skirmish, forsakes all the Country lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebel against the Romans, and are victoriously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Abassadors.

§. VII. Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extremum difficulty and danger enters into Tempe. The

The cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The Town of Diium quitted by Martius, repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Martius a cunning and a bad man.

§. VIII. Of L. Æmylius Paulus, the Consul. His journey. He foreseeth Perseus to discamp. He will not hazard battel with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Æmylius his superstition. The battel of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdom; which hastily yields to Æmylius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yields himself to the Roman Admiral: and is sent prisoner to Æmylius.

§. XI. The war of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

§. XII. How the Romans were dreadful unto all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Maffaniffa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The triumphs of Paulus, Antiochus, and Octavius: With the Conclusion of the Work.

THE LIFE OF Sir WALTER RALEIGH.

Determine to write the Life, the Rise, Fortunes, and End of Walter Raleigh, Knight; his Memoirs being certainly worthy to be transmitted to Posterity, who hath been so successfully industrious in retrieving the Actions of former Ages from the Ruines of Time, even in its very Infancy, in a well-compile'd, masculine, and learned History of the World. The Image of so great a Person should not be quite lost, though drawn in little, which deserves to be pourtrayed by the greatest Masters of Policy, and with the boldest Touches. Indeed his Shadows cannot now be well left exact, seeing they must be taken so long after his Death; when Time hath defac'd his best Features, and shed Oblivion on the most beautiful of his Actions. Who follows Truth (as Sir Walter has wisely remark'd) too near the heels, may have his teeth struck out; and he that goes after her, oft loseth her sight, and himself too. Distance of time doth sometimes, like some mediums, make the straightest Actions seem crooked, and sometimes gives them the advantage of Landscapes, which appear taking and agreeable afar off, though when nearly search'd, and pry'd into by a curious and intelligent Eye, they seem rude, harsh, and unpleasant. We must therefore despair of a just and exact Account of him, unless we could by some Magick power (as the Author of a Pamphlet has done, to terrify and make Gondomore speak the truth) raise him from the dead, and converse a while with his Ghost. I shall however with what imperfect Clue our Histories have bequeath'd, trace him through the various Labyrinths of Fortune, and take a Prospect of him in the several Scenes of Court and Camp, Peace and War, till I have followed him to the Scaffold, the place of his much lamented and unhappy End; keeping as near as I can a medium between those who in their Annals drive on with an implicit faith; and those, who to get the reputation of Observers and men of Reach, steal into the private Recesses of Princes, and disrobe Majesty it self to find some Deformities, which love to their Prince, and interest of State should cover; The best vail for all deform'd Actions.

In his Preface to the History of the World.

In his Britannia.

I find him born at a place, call'd Budely, or Budliegh, in the County of Devon, in an house which his Family had long posselt, call'd Hays: A Country (as Mr. Cambden has observ'd) renown'd among foreign Nations for the Valour of the Inhabitants in Sea-Services of all sorts. That Spain thought so, Sir Francis Drake, with many others of that Country, as well as our Sir Walter, are very convincing Arguments.

That he was well defended, was never yet questioned, but by my Lord of Oxon, who indeed was wont to call him the Jack, and Upstart. But these were words which only Envy and Emulation could extort, and every one very easily confute.

Sir Robert
Nanton.

Indeed that he was a Gentleman, because a Favourite, was no ill Argument among the Politicians of those Times, if we may believe a Secretary of State, who hath left this as a Maxim then, That the Queen through her whole Reign never was guilty of creation, never in her choice took into her Favour a meer new man, or a Mechanick.

That he was but poor in the beginning seems not strange, if we consider him the youngest Brother, and the Fortunes of his Family much diminished by the Generosity (if not Prodigality) of his Ancestors. But the wants of Fortune are often recompenc'd with the richer gifts of the Mind; Nature foreseeing the disability of his Estate, stock'd him with a larger portion of Sense, bequeath'd him the fairer Patrimony of a faithful Memory, plausible Tongue, strong Wit, and solid Judgment.

But because the natural Endowments of the Mind, though never so great, are capable of advancement by the help of Education, he resolv'd for one of the Universities. Oxon had the happiness to own him, where I find him in Oriel Collegg. His slender Fortune, and his active Genius, always pointed with a restless Ambition, would not let him settle here, so that he could only (like a Spy) take a transient view of, or (like an hasty Enemy) make some incursions and inrodes into those parts of Learning, which he afterwards conquered, and was entirely Master of.

Therefore that he might the better feed those Hopes Ambition had kindled in his thoughts, and remove nearer to the Mistress he courted; He resolv'd for one of the Inns of Court, which he knew were always places of Esteem with the Queen, who would say, they fitted Youth for the future. Here he spent his time, and improv'd himself in the intricate knowledge of our Laws, and in the studies of all manly and real Accomplishments.

But he staid not long here neither, for Fate it seems would have him of the Sword first. Yet though he laid aside his Gown, it was not with a design of never reassuming it; for through the frequent Vicissitudes of his whole Life, he challeng'd a Reputation among the most Eminent States-men, being upon all Emergencies of Affairs consulted, as one of the best Oracles of Government and Policy in his time. It's true he was never sworn, for some Reasons of State which Courts spread a Vail over, but was frequently called to Council. Through his Life he made good his Motto, tam Marti, quam Mercurio: and it is still a Question, Whether he was the better Statesman or Soldier? incomparably excelling in both the Arts of Peace and War. To rise by his Studies, probably his Condition and Ambition would not let him judge the speediest course, much time and a considerable fortune being often spent in climbing up the tedious steps of Preferment that way. He thought it more easy to fight, than talk himself into a Reputation. Active Times, and a busy War-like Princess, pointed him out the readiest way to the Temple ple of Honour. The Sword he judg'd with Alexander the quickest Instrument to unty all the Knots and tedious Obstacles of Greatness.

Nor could he want Occasions enow to draw forth his Spirits into Action. France was engag'd in a Civil-War; And the Queen, whether out of concern for the Protestants, or for reason of State, to divert the Giant-Enemy the Spaniard, assist'd the poor distressed Dutch. And the Spaniard by a Policy of the same nature, rais'd Rebellions in Ireland, which, like subterranean Fires, broke out over all the Kingdom at several times; when one Mac had in one place spent his Force, presently we hear of the Eruption of another. This Fire was kept in to the end of her Reign, being maintained by that lasting Fewel of Rebellion, and common pretext of change in Government, Religion: The Pope pretending the Kingdom belonged to St. Peter.

Of his first publick Appearance Mr. Cambden hath given us this Account: The Queen though imbroil'd in a Rebellion at home of the Earl of Northumberland and Dacres in the North, Yet fail'd not to relieve the Protestants in France, who were now brought into a distressed and almost desperate condition; she exhorted all the Protestant Princes to assist the Common Cause, supplied the Queen of Navar with Money, taking Jewels in pawn; Permitted Henry Champernowne to carry into France a Troop of Gentlemen-Volunteers, who were resolv'd to make good the Motto their Colours bore, Finem det nobis Virtus. Among these Sir Walter engag'd himself, though (as Mr. Cambden goes on) very young, and now first beginning to be of any note. So soon the early blossoms of his Valour began to appear, which afterwards grew up to an exact ripeness and perfection. France was the first School, wherein he learnt the Rudiments of War; and the Low-Countries and Ireland (the Military Academies of those times) made him Master of that Discipline; for in both places he expos'd himself afterwards to Land-Service: But their slender Pay encouraged him not to stay long in either. The Service of Ireland especially scarce supplying the necessities of a Military Life. Being restless and impatient of a narrow and low condition, and his Services being not so successful as his Hopes were great, and his Merits not answer'd with a Fortune strong enough to buoy up his Reputation, he was resolv'd to leave no stone unturned, nor any Method of living unexperimented. And since his Land-Expeditions could make no Additions to his Fortunes, Novelty and a desire of putting himself into a better capacity, urg'd him to a Sea-Voyage. At both Sea and Land he was the true pattern of Industry; and if any Man ever manag'd Necessity to its furthest improvements, it was He. No expert Soldier or Mariner escap'd his Acquaintance and Enquiries; nothing that related to the Arts of War and Navigation mis'd his perusal, and one who was Master of those parts he enjoy'd could with no difficulty make those Arts his own. Add to this the Methods he us'd to improve himself. He slept but five hours, four he spent in reading and mastering the best Authors, two in a select conversation and an inquisitive discourse, the rest in business. He underwent all the labours that attend a Soldier, and far'd as the meanest. No common Mariner took more pains, or hazarded more in the most difficult attempts.

What his Sea-Voyages produced Histories are silent in; but not long after his return I find him got again into Ireland, appearing with his own Colours flying in the Field, under the command of the Lord Grey, who succeeded Pelham in the Deputyship of that Kingdom. He had not been long there, before a Quarrel was rais'd between the Lord-Deputy and our Captain, (for with that Title he went into Ireland) which being complain'd of to a Council

cil of War, was referr'd to the Council-Table in England. Our Historians would make the Lord Grey's Cause the fairest, but Justice, and the result of the Council, gave Raleigh the Victory. What were the occasions of this Quarrel our Annals slip over, and have only left a large Field for Conjecture to tire it self in. Whether an eager pursuit after Honour, without exact obedience to Military Command, occasioned by a restless desire of doing something great, or whatever else it might be, we leave the Reader to fancy. However if his Cause had not been good, no Apology, how well soever managed, could have brib'd the Judgment of so wise a Council, wholly strangers to his Worth and Person.

About this time Authors place the Era of his Rise, but cannot well agree about the occasion of it. Some would have Leicester to be the chief Agent in it, and that he related the whole business at Council to the Queen with no little advantage to our Captain. Not so much probably out of respect to Raleigh, as to his own interest. For Favourites, like their Princes, seldom espouse any Cause upon any other ground than what advances or stands with their own Designs. His own Designs indeed on the Queen were blasted, and finding the burden and envy of a Statesman too heavy for his aged shoulders, he was willing handsomely to impart them to a more active Genius. Though great Favourites seldom admit of a Partner, till Age makes them willing to withdraw and leave the trouble of business to more sprightly years. They care not to have new Plants set, till they themselves are almost withered and sapless.

Others would have his Rise attributed to Suffex, who brought him to Court to outshine Leicester, and eclipse the splendor of his Enemy. But what was the strongest Argument and only Periwinkle with the Queen was his Merits, which she soon saw, and presently encouraged. Nor must I here pass by one small step to his future Height, which our Chronicles have overlook'd, as below the Pen of an Historian, though some have judg'd an Account of some little transactions the best Inlets to Truth and Mysteries of State. The occasion was thus: Our Captain coming over out of Ireland upon the aforementioned Cause to Court, in very good habit (which it seems was the greatest part of his Estate) which is often found to be no mean Introducer where Delights are not known, found the Queen walking, till she was stop'd by a plashy-place which she scrupled treading on, presently he spread his new Plush-Coat on the ground, on which the Queen trod gently, being not a little pleas'd as well as surpriz'd with so unexpected a Complement. Thus, as one remarks upon this Story, An advantageous Admission into the first Notices of a Prince is more than half a degree to Preferment. For he presently after found some gracious Beams of Favour reflecting on him, which he was resolv'd, and well knew how to cherish and contract. To put the Queen in remembrance, he wrote in a Window obvious to her Eye, Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.

Which her Majesty either espying, or being shewn, under-wrote this Answer,

If thy Heart fail thee, climb not at all.

But his aspiring Soul could not rest in the lower, though safer way of living; He could not be mean, whose Resolutions were so great, and whose Prudence and and Activity made him capable of the highest Preferments. Inspir'd with a restless and ambitious Genius he design'd nothing but what was extreme, and had rather not be, than not be one of the most Eminent. And to the greatest Height probably he had arrived, had he lived in any other Princes Reigns than that of Q. Elizabeth and K. James, the former being not over-hasty to raise any to any great Honour, and the latter not caring for Men of War and Blood.

Raleigh was so towards an Apprentice in the Court-Trade, that he soon set up for himself, and would have improv'd this stock of Favour to a great advantage, had he not lost by those common Enemies to it, Envy and Jealousie. In a short time he is become a Minion, obtains the Queens Ear, is often consulted, and nothing done without him. Her Favour and his Parts began to alarm his Rivals, who like some envious Neighbours will not easily permit any Fabrick to stand long that hinders their own Prospect. Jealous Favourites, like wise Planters, will not suffer the Under-Wood to rise, which may obstruct the growth of taller Trees.

Leicester began to repent his choice of his Creature, and thought he grew too fast in his Mistress Favour. To stop the current of her Affection, he privately endeavours to undermine his Esteem, and introduce a new Favourite that might be his Rival. To bring about this design, Leicester thought there would be nothing wanting, if by Raleigh's absence he could have opportunity to introduce the Earl of Essex; nor did he long expect before one offer'd it self: for the Queen being willing to encourage Raleigh, (who, as Mr. Cambden is pleas'd to tell us, was never sufficiently to be commended for the great pains he took to discover remote Countries, and to advance the Glory of the English Navigation and Trade) sent him on a Voyage to Sea. Nor did he make a vain and fruitless one; for at his Return he brought news of a new Country, discover'd by him in the Year 1584, called in honour of the Queen Virginia, before call'd Ancientoria by the barbarous Inhabitants. A Country that hath been since of no inconsiderable Profit to our Nation. But though Patents were granted to him to settle a Plantation there, it grew not famous till the Reign of King James: Wherein this Nation quickly found out the Excellency and Fruitfulness of the place, so agreeable to our English Bodies, and profitable to the Exchequer. Nature there is prodigal, and makes amends for her parsimony to other parts of the World. An Acre there yielding often forty Bushels of Corn; and, which is more strange, there being three Harvests in a Year: For their Corn is sow'd, ripe, and cut down in little more than two Months.

For this, and other beneficial Expeditions and Designs, this Year her Majesty was pleas'd to confer on him the honour of Knighthood, which in her Reign was more esteemed than in her Successors. The Queen keeping the Temple of Honour close shut, and never open'd but to Virtue and Desert. Nor was she indeed ever hasty to reward; for she seldom paid in any other coin than Patents and good Words. So that the greatest number of those who might pretend to Favour, were the Architects of their own Fortunes, and had little or no Encouragement from her, more than that of a Spectator, who praises the Workmanship, and commends the handfom Contrivances of a Building; but is at no part of the Expences of raising it. Hence our Sir Walter's Rewards are quickly enumerated, for he got nothing after all his Exploits and Designs, but the Wardenship of the Stameries, Command of the Guard, and the Government of Jersey and Virginia; Places of no very great Profit, nor answerable to his Worth, or just Ambition.

1588. In 1588, the Grand Climacterick of Spain, (for Bodies Politick have their Critical Times) I find Sir Walter by his Example encouraging others of the Gentry to set out Ships at their proper charges, and by his admirable Conduct and Courage to put them to the best use. Which hired Ships were Actors of no small use in that fatal Blow given to the Invincible Armada. Three Years this Giant had been growing to that portentous Greatness, with infinite Expences and Industry; but was beaten, ruin'd, and dishonourably overthrown in less than a Months space: the Spaniards finding that our Ships as well as the Heavens could fight against them.

1592. But this Shock, like some Ague-fit, was easily recovered, and in a short time after the Spaniards began to renew their former Designs. For in the Parliament which began Feb. 19. 1592, I find Sir Walter Raleigh informing the House, that the Queen could not without Subsidies prevent the eminent Dangers threaten'd from the Spaniard. Of which Subsidies he spake (as he protesteth) not only to please the Queen, to whom he was infinitely obliged, but for the necessity he both saw and knew; He told them, he very well discovered the great strength of the King of Spain; and to shew his Mightiness, he inform'd the House how he possess'd all the World. And that his Malice and ill purposes against this Realm might be evident, he shew'd how on every side he had beleaguerr'd us; In Denmark, the King being young, he had corrupted the Council and Nobility; so it was very likely he would speed himself of Ships from thence. In the Maritime Towns of the Low-Countries, and in Norway he hath laid in great store of Shipping. In France he hath the Parliament-Towns at command; In Britanny he hath all the best Havens; and in Scotland he hath corrupted the Nobility, and promis'd them Forces to assist the Papists, and that they were ready to joyn with any Foreign Aids, that would make them strong enough to be by themselves, and to resist others; for, as he thought, there were not six Gentlemen of that Country of one Religion. In his own Country there are all possible Preparations making, and he is coming with sixty Gallies, besides other Shipping. If our Subsidies are not sudden, he may with ease invade us riding at Anchor; but all will be little enough to withstand him. At his coming he fully resolveth to get Plymouth, or at least to possess some of the Havens this Summer within our Land. And Plymouth is in most danger; for no Ordnance can be carried thither to remove him, the passages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him, is to send a Royal Army and supplant him in Britanny, and to possess our selves there; and to send a strong Navy to Sea, and to lye with it on the Cape, and at Lambuck, to which places come all his Ships with Riches from all places, and there they may set upon all that come.

What success this Speech alone had I know not, but the Subsidy was granted, with the general consent of the House, to carry on a War against Spain. His Expedition a little after demonstrates that the Queen took his Advice, which was to afflict the Spaniards at a distance; and whilst he could not handomly assault his more neighbourly and guarded parts, to disturb those that were more naked and further off, his Indies. The Moneys brought from thence being the Nerves and Sinews of his Power, and the chiefest Incendiary in the Irish Rebellion, which if handomly stop'd, would put an end to his Greatness, and humble the mighty Monarch.

That he might not want an opportunity to shew his Valour and Conduct in this Affair, the Queen sends him to Sea to manifest both; thinking none more fit to be employed in a Business, than the Person that counsel'd and started it. Having the Courage of a Soldier to put in execution the sober Advices of the Gown-man. To America he is sent with fifteen Men of War to possess himself of Panama, where the Spaniards ship their Riches, or to intercept their passage homewards. But he found more Encouragement from the willingness of the Seamen than from the Winds, which held the Ships in their Havens for three months; a Circumstance, which put an ill look upon the Enterprize, and had almost made it vain. But nothing could allay the Courage of the Seamen, who were buoy'd up with the hopes of Prey, and the success of their Commander. Having set sail at last, they got beyond the Spanish Cape, called the Lands-end, where they met with unwelcome Intelligence, viz. That by express Command from his Catholick Majesty no Ship was to stir from the West-Indies that Year. Together with this News, instead of meeting with the long'd-for Enemy, they were attack'd with a more invincible one, a furious Tempest, which dispers'd and disorder'd the Fleet, and sunk their Ship-Boats. Thus being on all sides assaulted with Tempests, Disasters, and the worse news of the Spaniards stay in the other World, he thought the Heavens had dash'd his Designs, and render'd a well-ordered Contrivance abortive. Upon which at first he intended to make for home with the whole Fleet; but another Project offer'd it self after second thoughts, of dividing the Navy into two Squadrons, from the hope that though while together they had been successles, yet Fortune might offer to them when separated something worthy their patience and desires. Immediately one Squadron is committed to the conduct of Sir John Burroughs, Son to the Lord Burroughs; the other to Sir Martin Forbisher, with their respective Commissions. Sir Martin's charge was to lie off and on the Coast of Spain, to hinder the coming in of their Vessels. Sir John's to wait at the Azores for the coming of the Caracks out of the East-Indies.

Sir Walter was much blam'd for this Action, and thought short in his Politics in giving over the hopeful part of the Design to Sir John Burroughs, and retiring himself to Court. But the Success was the only Argument of his Oversight, and nothing but the Event could charge him with Imprudence. The Division of the Fleet proved a wise Design, and amazed the Spaniard. For while the Spanish Admiral eyed Forbisher, the mighty Caracks were unguarded, and left to the mercy of Burroughs's Men of War as an easy prey. Who having according to Order arriv'd at Santa Cruce, a small Town in the Isle of Azores, a little after got sight of a Portugal Merchant-man, (briskly pursued by a Privateer of the Earl of Cumberland's) but could not reach her, an unhappy Calm keeping him at a too far distance. But a more welcome Storm arising in the night, forc'd both to weigh Anchor. As soon as day appear'd, the Portuguese was unloading as fast as she could at Flores, and upon the approach of the English fired their Carack: But though their Designs were ruin'd on that Ship, yet the news they got from some Prisoners taken, gave them fresh hopes, and hearten'd them with the Information, that several other Merchant-men were behind coming for Spain. This put Sir John Burroughs upon placing his Men of War at several distances, to reach as far about as was possible. But they had not long waited, before their diligence was rewarded with the surprizal of a large Vessel, called the Mother of God, which was 165 foot long from Head to Stern, and seven Decks high, laden with Goods to the value of 150000 l. English, besides what the Seamen privately seiz'd for their own use.

Sir Walter having now deserted his Naval Employ, and become again a Courtier, it was not long before he was seized with the idle Court-Disease of Love, the unfortunate occasion of the worst Action of his whole Life. For in the Year 1695, I find him under a Cloud, banish'd the Court, and his Mistresses Favour withdrawn, for devirginating a Maid of Honour. But why for this one Action he should lie under the imputation of an Atheist, and from a single crime get the denomination of a Debauch, is the Logick of none but the Vulgar. By the same reason the other Favourites of those Times (Leicester, Cecil, and Essex) bid as fair for those titles, the latter making the Parallel good in this Vice, with his Successor Buckingham, though in other circumstances there was a great disparity. Neither ever was it a Crime of any magnitude in the Orb of Courts. But to stop the Mouth of Fame, which is always open on such occasions, and to wipe out the Infamy of the Fact, he was shortly after married to the Object of his Love, the deflowred Lady. And to get Reputation among the People, who always were unjust to him in their Sentiments, he put himself on a Voyage to Guiana, for the Improvement and Honour of his Country. Having therefore obtained his Liberty (for, for this Action he was imprisoned some months) and finding all things with an unpleasant Aspect, he followed his Genius of discovering new Places, and tracing Nature in her more retired and hidden Paths; thinking that Absence, and a fortunate Voyage, might reinvest him in his Mistresses thoughts, and merit a new Esteem.

Guiana had been talk'd of much by the Spaniards as an excellent Country, and for one Commodity the Spaniards had a great reverence for, very famous, Gold, which put Sir Walter upon the Attempt, judging it besides a place (if mastered) very convenient for its situation to annoy and disturb the Spaniards American Traffic, and would be no little help in building his Fortunes, and what was more estimable, Place him in his Mistresses Favour again.

From Plsmouth he set sail on the sixth of February, and on the 22d of March arrived at the Isle of Trinidad, eight degrees on this side the Equinoctial-Line; where he soon made himself Master of St. Josephs, a small City; and, which was more considerable, of the Governour Antonio Bereo, from whom he got the best Account of those Parts, and its Trade. Leaving his Ship at Trinidad, with some Pinaces and an hundred Men, and the small stock of Knowledge he obtained of Bereo, he made up the great River Ormus, in search of Guiana. What he found, saw, and performed there, his most ingenious History of those Parts, may satisfy the Curious.

In his Return he fired Cumana, because the Inhabitants would not redeem it with Money; besides several Cottages at St. Maries, and Rio de la Hach. Neither did he desist in this Design of Guiana, for once or twice Mr. Cambden tells us afterwards he prosecuted it with vast Expences, although the Spaniards had placed a Colony at Trinidad to hinder his further Attempts.

Whilst Sir Walter is searching for a new World, Hawkins and Drake are attempting fresh things in those parts of America which the Spaniards were already possess'd of. But their old Fortune had left them, and the unhappiness of the Action put an end to their Lives; In the Year 1596, both died with Grief, and bequeath'd their Hatred of the Spaniard to Sir Walter, to revenge their Quarrel.

Who this Year return'd, being satisfied with his Expedition, and much more with the Reception he found at Court. The Storm was blown over, and his Mistresses Brow was more smooth than at his departure; after his Eclipse Eclipse he shone brighter at Court, and the Death of those two famous Seamen, put them upon courting Sir Walter, whom the necessity of State forced them to cherish and encourage. It's strange, that what was Essex's Ruine should confirm Sir Walter in favour, frequent absence from his Mistress. But Sir Walter's Obsequiousness work'd much upon the humour of the Queen, who lov'd Pliantness and exact Obedience, which Essex could not always counterfeit.

The Spaniard being encouraged with the possession of Cales, from whence it was but a short cut over into England, the Death of Hawkins, and their former scourge, Drake, and the earnest Solicitations of the Irish (who through her Reign had got the Itch of Rebellion, which was fed and maintained by the Spaniard, though they had been sufficiently bloodied by the English.) And the Queen foreseeing a Storm gathering, thought the best way was to scatter it before it grew too great, and came too near. She resolv'd therefore to begin with the Spaniard first, and fairly set on the Enemy in his own Ports. She speedily riggs a brave Fleet, consisting of 150 Ships, mann'd by 6360 Souldiers, 1000 Volunteer-Gentlemen, 6772 Seamen. Robert Earl of Essex, and the Lord Howard were Commanders of equal Authority, having been both at an excessive charge in carrying on the War. To these were joyned a Council of War, consisting of several eminent Seamen and Souldiers, among whom was our Sir Walter. The Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the first commanded by the Admiral Lord Howard; the second by Essex; the third by Sir Thomas Howard; the fourth by Sir Walter Raleigh.

In the beginning of June they set sail, and got to Gades the 20th: their design being perfectly unknown, as well to their Enemies as their own Men. Essex heated with Youth, and an ambition of doing bravely, would have presently landed and assaulted the Enemy: but this heat was allayed and corrected by Sir Walter's Advice, vvho impugned all such rash Attempts. At last a fit Opportunity presented it self, and by all it was resolv'd to fight them. At vvhich news the Earl threw up his Hat for joy. The Ebbing Waters vvould not permit the great Ships to engage, the Shelves being of greater hazard than the Enemy. Therefore Raleigh is pitch'd on as the most proper Person in the midst of the Chanel to provoke them, vvho accordingly in a little Ship called the Waffsight, directed his Prow against the Spanish Men of War, vvich thereupon presently fell back. Upon this the rest of the Fleet came in, and burnt and took several of their Ships. After this Victory at Sea, the Men vvere very importunate to go ashore, vvhom Essex Landed at Puntal, a League from the City. At first the Spaniards received them vvith a great deal of courage, but the English charged so vvarmly, that they thought it their prudentest vvay to retire vvith more speed than they came out. The English pursued so close, that they had almost recovered the City-Gates as soon as they. The Earl got upon a Bulwark near the Gate, and from thence he elyped an Entrance into the Town, but very hazardous, it being down a very steep Precipice: but this did not affright several of our English, vvho leaped from thence into the Town, and engaged the Enemy in the Streets. In the mean time Sir Walter and others having forced the Gates, entered the Town, and the Castle was surrendred on Merciful Conditions. But Sir Walter vvvas not idle, or eager after the enjoyment of his Conquest; for vvhist others were reaping the plentiful Harvest of War, he vvith some small ships vvho could pass up the Chanel, fired their Merchant-men vvich vvere withdrawn to Port-Real, although they offered two millions of Ducats for their Redemption. Great were the Losses to the Spaniards by this War; and if we may believe our Histories, amounted to no less than Twenty Millions of Pounds. Upon Consultation it was resolv'd to quit the Town, though contrary to the Opinion of Effex, who was for keeping it, as a future Annoyance to the Spaniards. After this they took Faro in Algarbe, and being weary at last of their Victories, they resolv'd for Home, though much against Effex's will, whose youthful heat was but inflam'd by their Successes, but was wisely stak'd by the prudence of the Admiral, and the sober advice of Sir Walter: who finding their Men sick, and having gotten so ample Rewards, were not again for hazarding their Fortune upon hopes of a future Prey.

At their Return the Queen welcom'd and encourag'd her Souldiers with new Honours. All but Effex were pleas'd, who found State-Preferments not dispos'd of according to his mind. Vere was made Governour of the Briel, and Sir Robert Cecil Secretary of State.

To recover their Losses at Gales, the Spaniard riggs out a new Fleet, which were battell alone by the Winds; for the greatest part were cast away and wreck'd. With the Reliques of this Fleet, in the Year following I find him upon his old Designs of Ireland: But the Queen was always too nimble for the Grave-Dun, whose Designs, like his Ships, mov'd slow and heavy.

Twenty Ships were rigg'd out at present, and afterwards encreased to an hundred and twenty Men of War and Victuallers; five thousand Men rais'd, besides a thousand old Souldiers who came from the Netherlands with Vere. To appease Effex, the whole Conduct of the Expedition is committed to him. The Navy was divided into three Squadrons; The first led by Effex himself; The second by Howard; The third by Sir Walter, who now was esteem'd the ablest Seaman of his Age. To enable this Expedition, several Persons of quality of all sorts engag'd themselves, who look'd rather like Couriers than Souldiers, being more adorn'd with Feathers and gay Cloaths, than arm'd with Courage and Resolution. On the ninth of July they set out with these Instructions, viz. To steer to Faro and the Groine, to surprize the Spaniards in their Harbours, and to intercept their Indian Fleet (the Bait of the War) at the Azores. Which Design was built upon very good Maxims of State; for it would hinder the Fleet intended against England; Their Merchant-men wanting Convoys, might be seized on; The Azores won, (where the Indian Fleet always call'd for fresh Water in their Return;) the Queen have the Dominion of the Seas; and the Spaniard be oblig'd to a Treatment of Peace. Effex gave out that he was resolv'd to sacrifice Himself and the Navy for his Country: But his brisk Resolutions were quickly daunted by a dismal Tempest, which astonish'd the Mariners themselves, and forc'd home our gaydy Volunteers, who thought no Enemy so terrible as a Tempest, and the severe motions of a Sea-sick Stomack. Thus by this Contradiction of Heaven their Ships were torn, their Victuals spent, and they upon this Emergency forc'd to a Consultation what to do. Some were for laying aside the Faro and the Groine Attempts; others for a Voyage to the Azores, which was contradicted by Vere. So that at last Effex and Raleigh were pitch'd on to ride Post for Advice to the Queen. Effex talk'd to the Queen of strange Chimeras; how that if he were permitted to have the Fleet, he would with ease fire the Spanish Navy, and perform many other bold Designs; about which the Queen caution'd him, and desir'd the whole Business should be managed as their joynt-discretion should prompt, and opportunity offer it self. But if it were possible, if any occasion courted them them to it, they should fire the Ships in Faro Haven, and intercept what other Ships they could from the Indies; And upon all occasions manifest their Conduct and Valour. With these Instructions they set sail again from Plimouth, (whether they were returned the 17th of August) but were separated by a Tempest near the Promontory Nerium, or the Lands-end. A cross Yard in Raleigh's Ship was broken by the Impetus of the Storm, and fell, which forc'd him to stay behind to make it good; And having been fallily inform'd that the Spanish Fleet was bound for the Azores, after having repaired his Ship, he steer'd his course thitherwards. In the mean time Effex's Jealousy, and the pernicious Insinuations of Raleigh's Enemies, had wrought him into a belief that this Division of the Navy was on purpose laid and fore-design'd by Raleigh: But however the business was put up at his Arrival, and Effex welcomed him, making an Apology for acquainting the Queen with the Division fallily represented, and built (as it appear'd) on wrong suppositions.

Here wanting Water, Sir Walter landed without leave, and scarce had taken in Water before he received Orders immediately to follow Effex to Faro, whither he repair'd; but not finding Effex there according to his Order, he spent his time in taking an exact survey of the Haven, and of the People there, who from the fear and apprehension of what followed, were hastily packing away their Goods. This fair Opportunity, upon Consultation, puts him upon taking the Town, and egg'd on the Souldiers in hopes of an ample Prey. Sir Gilly Merrick (one of Effex's Creatures) dissuaded Sir Walter from the Design, alledging it would rob the Earl of the Honour of taking it, and so confirm him his Enemy. But Sir Walter's desire of Glory, and the Souldiers Avarice, urg'd him (after he had staid some time for Effex's Arrival) to the Assault of the Place, which was at last taken. The next day after this Exploit Effex arriv'd at Faro, where he was quickly inform'd of what Raleigh had done, and that the whole Business was transacted with no other design than to rob him of the Glory, which his Jealousy made him easily believe.

Some perswaded the Earl to try Sir Walter before a Council of War, and cashier him; others without more ado would have him put to death, for landing without Orders: At last some of Raleigh's Officers were cashier'd, He himself frown'd on, and severely reprov'd by Effex. But he never wanted an Apology for his Ambition; instancing that he was not oblig'd to the Orders the inferior Officers and Souldiers were; that the Commission did not reach Him, being one of the three Generals; Moreover, that he staid for him four days; that he was necessitated at last to land, being in extrem want of Water, which was not to be had without fighting. However, the Lord Howard became his Mediator, and perswaded him to an honourable submission; which was perform'd, and accepted of; and thereupon both himself, and the cashier'd Captains and Souldiers were again admitted into favour. But this was only laying their Passions asleep awhile, which in the sequel of our Story were again awaken'd. I cannot here omit a speech of the Earls upon this occasion, (which Sir Henry Watton calls a Noble Word) who being urg'd to put Sir Walter on Martial Law: That I would do, said he, if he were my Friend.

However this Expedition was not so glorious and great as at first they hoped it might have been. For after burning the Town, and taking Flores, Gratiosa, and Villa Franca in St. Michaels, with three American Spanish Ships, together with the burning of a Carack, they came home much torn, leaky, and weather-beaten, about the end of October. This Expedition was commented on variously by the People, who were strangely carried on with a blind passion for Essex, and so very prone to misconstrue Raleigh's Actions, from a Prejudice they had entertain'd, that because he was not Essex's friend, he must be an enemy to his Country. However, the Queen look'd on him with another eye, and he grew faster in her favour than his Rival, who from this time began rather to decline, by a Fault Sir Walter was afterwards guilty of, Insatiable Ambition; a Principle that put him on those Practices which brought him afterwards to the Block. Essex was incens'd that Sir Robert Cecil, Raleigh's Friend, was prefer'd in his absence. And because the Earl's Concerns are woven amongst Sir Walter's, it will not be impertinent to give some Account of him here.

Essex was arrived at the height of Favour, and might have staid there, had he taken his Measures aright, had he own'd an Obsequiousness to the Queen, or been Master of the great Requisite in a Courtier, Disimulation; but it was a part of his Character, to be a great Refenter, and a weak Dissembler of the least Disgrace. His Ireland Transactions were ill construed, and his Miscarriages nicely dissected by the curious eyes of those State-Anatomists, the Lord-Treasurer Buckhurst, the Lord-Admiral Nottingham, and his mortal Enemy Secretary Cecil, who began to remove him out of that Favour he had so long possess'd. But it was true, as the Earl of Clarendon has observ'd, "That though he was Rival'd by a strong and subtle Faction, which cared, consulted for his Ruine; yet the Danger was thus allayed, that they were all his publick and profess'd Enemies, and so known to the Queen, that they durst never impertinently urge ought against him, since they were sure that Malice was concluded, when the Reason of their Objection haply might not be considered."

However, in 1601 the Earl drew near his Ruine: for being hurried on by Cissy ill Counsel, and his own Discontents, he projects new Plots against the State, and tampers with the King of Scots to remove his Enemies at Court by force, informing him that the Power of the Nation lay in their hands, Raleigh being Governour of Jersey, &c. and other of his Enemies having the strength of the Nation at their command. And vainly presuming upon the love of the Citizens, he projects to seize the Court, and to secure Raleigh, as the most considerable Enemy he had. Of which Design Gorges informs Sir Walter. The better to carry on his Designs, Essex goes into London, where he endeavoured to excite the Citizens to an Insurrection: But the City then being Rich, were not so apt to rebel; Rebellion being usually the Daughter of Poverty and Discontent. For these Treasonable Actions, being found guilty, he was condemned and executed.

That he died bravely and like a Gentleman, is not to be questioned; but that Sir Walter Raleigh should come openly to see him die, on purpose only to sat his Eyes with the Sacrifice of his Enemy, can never be granted, if we may believe himself in the same circumstances on the Scaffold, where he told his Auditors on the words of a Dying-man, he only came there to defend himself if any thing had been urged against him by the Earl.

Thus ended that Favourite, whose Death struck a damp on the Queens prosperous days, and gave blackness to her declining Reign. This Blow, like that of Gunpowder, not only blew up his Friends and Neighbours, but shook his Enemies at a distance; for it reached Sir Walter too, who wanting strength to grapple with his Rival the Treasurer, and not owning humility enough enough to be his Servant, perished at last in the Encounter. This himself pretlag'd (if we may believe Osborn) as he came from the Execution of Essex in a Boat, when he was heard to say, That it was more safe to have many enemies at Court of equal power, than one false and ambitious friend who hath attain'd to the absoluteness of Command.

The Queen could not long survive her Favourite; for I find her Death to be the next Year following. A Queen who had enriched the Nation, reform'd Religion, curb'd the Pride of Spain, supported France, preserv'd Scotland, protected the Hollander against the Spaniards, and had vanquish'd his Armies by Sea and Land, reduced Ireland to obedience notwithstanding all the subtil practices of Spain, and open Assistance given in Arms to her Irish Rebels, with many other things which might seem too much to be the Achievements of one Reign.

King James her Successor came to the possession of a Kingdom arrived at the height of Prosperity, which like all other Bodies when they are at their ^{APPEAR} tend to Corruption, and degenerate. This Sir Walter perceiv'd, and would have, as he thought, remedied. Sir John Fortescue, the Lord Cobham, Sir Walter, and others, would have oblig'd the King by Articles before his coming to the Crown, that his Country-mens number should be limited: But this was stopp'd by the prudent Treasurer, and the bold Northumberland. Sir Walter fear'd that the Scots, like Locusts, would quickly devour this Kingdom; it being probable that, like the Goths and Vandals, they would settle in any Country rather than their own, and would make it their business to render our Nation as beggarly as theirs: for this, He, with the rest of them, was afterwards frown'd on by the King, and lost his Command of the Guards.

However, Sir Walter still pursued the Good and Glory of his Country; and as formerly in Active Times, gave his Advice still against the Peace with Spain, which might now with no great difficulty be brought on its knees. At the entrance of the King he presented him with a Manuscript of his own writing, with no weak Arguments against the Peace. But Sir Walter was mistaken, for his Counsel was ill-timed, and a new Part was now to be acted, the Scene being changed. Peace was the King's Aim, whether out of Fear, or Religious Principles I determine not. But with Spain a Peace is concluded, with an Enemy already humbled, who now had time given them to recover their former Losses, and were as it were cherish'd to assault us with the greater vigor; which how true it proved every man can tell. And as if the King would quite run counter to the Queens Politiques, the Estates of the Netherlands are despoiled, slighted, and deserted, under pretence that it were of ill example for a Monarch to protect them.

The King is hardly warm in his Throne, but there is a great noise of a Plot, generally call'd Sir Walter Raleigh's Treason, but upon what grounds I know not, since he had the least hand in it, as by his Tryal will appear. A Plot that is still a Mystery, and hath a Vail spread over it; A Plot compos'd of such a Hodge-podge of Religion and Interests, that the World stands amazed Sir Walter Raleigh should ever be drawn into it; A Plot so unlikely to hurt others, or benefit themselves, that as Osborn tells us, "If ever Folly was capable of the title, or Pity due to Innocence, theirs might claim so large a share, as not possible to be too severely condemn'd, or slightly enough punished. Envy and Disdain, as Sir Walter has told us in his Remains, seek Innovation by Faction. Discontent is the great Seducer, which at first put him to search into a Plot, he afterwards was betray'd into. The chief Ingredients in this Medley were two Priests Watson and Clark, and Count Arenbergh, Ambassador Extraordinary for the Arch-Duke, who brought in Cobham, and he his Brother George Brook, both Protestants, at least seeming so; George Brook hook'd in Parham and others, and they the Lord Grey of Wilton, a rank Puritan. Then came in Sir Walter, the wisest of them all, according to Sanderfon, who, as he tells us, dallied like a Fly in the Flame, till it consum'd him. Willing he was to know it, and thought by his Wit to over-reach the Confederates, whom he knew well enough, though he dealt with none but Cobham, as I can find out. One Mr. Lawrency an Antwerp-Merchant, was the property made use of by Arenbergh, and a Crony of the Lord Cobhams. These carried on the Contrivance a long while, which (as Sanderfon tells us) was betray'd by Lawrency, and the vigilancy of Cecil. And indeed it was morally impossible that so many disagreeing weak Souls should carry on a Project without taking Air; The least glimpse being enough to give light to the Statesmen of those times. Their Designs were,

1. To set the Crown on the Lady Arabella; or to seize on the King, and make him grant their Desires, and a Pardon.
2. To have a Toleration of Religion.
3. To procure Aid and Assistance from Foreign Princes.
4. To turn out of the Court such as they disliked, and place themselves in Offices.

Watson to be Lord-Chancellor.

George Brook Lord-Treasurer.

Sir Griffin Markham Secretary of State.

Lord Grey Master of the Horse, and Earl-Marshal of England. But it seems they made no provision for Sir Walter; which is no inconsiderable Argument of his Innocency, who would have deserved, and might have expected as great a Reward as any of them, had he been engaged in the Plot.

To oblige to Secrecy, Watson draws up an Oath. But all is betray'd; they are seized, examined, and tryed. How well or ill Sir Walter has acquitted himself, we shall leave to the Opinion of the Readers of the following TRYAL, which was exactly and faithfully taken.

THE ARRAIGNMENT OF Sir Walter Raleigh, K^t.

Temp.
Jac.
1603.

At Winton, Thursday the 17th of November, Anno. Dom. 1603. before the Right Honourable the Earl of Sussex, Lord Chamberlain.

Earl of Devon.

Lord Henry Howard.

Lord Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.

Lord Wotton.

Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain.

Lord Chief Justice of England, Popham.

Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, Andrews.

Justice Gaudie.

Justice Warburton, and others, Commissioners by special Delegate Assigned.

First, The Commission of Oyer and Terminer, was read by the Clerk of the Crown Office.

And then presently the Indictment was in effect as followeth:

That he did Conspire, and go about to Deprive the King of his Government, to raise up Sedition within the Realm, to alter Religion, to bring in the Roman Superstition, and to procure Foreign Enemies to invade the Kingdom. That the Lord Cobham, the 9th of June, did meet with the said Sir Walter Raleigh in Durham House, in the Parish of St. Martin in the Fields, and then and there had Conference with him how to Advance Arabella Stuart to the Crown, and Royal Throne of this Kingdom, and that then and there it was agreed, that Cobham should Treat with Arenbergh, Ambassador from the Arch Duke of Austria, to obtain of him 600000 Crowns, to bring to pass their intended Treasons. It was agreed, that Cobham should go to Albert the Arch-Duke, to procure him to advance the pretended Title of Arabella: From thence knowing that Albert had not sufficient Means to maintain his own Army in the Low Countries, Cobham should go to Spain to procure the King to assist, and further her pretended Title.

It was agreed, the better to Effect all this Conspiracy, that Arabella should write three Letters, one to the Arch-Duke, another to the King of Spain, and a third to the Duke of Savoy, and promise three things: First, To Establish firm Peace between England and Spain. Secondly, To Tolerate the Popish and Rom Superstition. Thirdly, To be Ruled by them in Contracting of her Marriage.

And for the effecting these Traiterous Purposes, Cobham should return by the Isle of Jersey, and should find Sir Walter Raleigh Captain of the said Isle there, and take Council of Raleigh, for the Distributing of the aforesaid Crowns, as the Occasion and Discontentment of the Subjects should give Cause and Way.

And further, That Cobham and his Brother Brook, met on the 9th of June, and Cobham told Brook all these Treasons: To the which Treasons, Brook gave his Assent, and did joyn himself to all these; and after on the Thursday following, Cobham and Brook did speak these words: That there would never be a good World in England, till the King (meaning our Sovereign Lord) and his Cubs (meaning his Royal Issue) were taken away.

And the more to Disable and Deprive the King of his Crown, and to Confirm the said Cobham in his Intent, Raleigh did Publish a Book, falsely Written against the most Just and Royal Title of the King, knowing the said Book to be Written against the just Title of the King; which Book Cobham after that, received of him. Further, for the better Effecting these Traiterous Purposes, and to Establish the said Brook in his Intent, the said

Cobham did deliver the said Book unto him, the 14th of June. And further, the said Cobham, on the 16th of June, for accomplishment of the said Conference; And by the Traitorous Infatigation of Raleigh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed Princes, to procure them to Advance her Title; and that she, after she had obtained the Crown, should promise to perform three things, viz. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To Tolerate with Impunity, the Popish and Roman Superstitions. 3. To be Ruled by them three, in the Contracting of her Marriage.

To these Motions, the said Brook gave his assent, and for the better Effecting of the said Treasons, Cobham on the 17th of June, by the Infatigation of Raleigh, did write Letters to Count Aremberg, and did deliver the said Letters to one Matthew de Lawrence, to be delivered to the said Count; Which he did deliver for the obtaining of 60000 Crowns, which Money by other Letters, Count Aremberg did promise to perform the Payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the 18th of June. And then did Cobham promise to Raleigh, that when he had received the said Money, he would deliver 8000 Crowns to him, to which Motion he did consent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he should receive the said Crowns, he would give to him 10000 thereof; to which Motion Brook did assent.

To the Indictment, Sir Walter Raleigh pleaded not Guilty.

THE JURY.

Robert Brunley, Gent.

Sir Walter Raleigh Prisoner, was asked, whether he would take Exceptions to any of the Jury.

Raleigh. I know none of them; they are all Christians and Honest Gentlemen, I except against none.

E. Suff. You Gentlemen of the Kings

Learned Jury, follow the same Courte as you did the other day.

Raleigh. I pray you, I may answer the Points particularly as they are delivered, by reason of the Weakness of my Memory and Sickness.

Popham, Chief Justice. After the Kings Learned Council have delivered all the Evidence, you may Answer particularly.

Heath, the Kings Sergeant at Law. You have heard of Raleigh's bloody attempts, to Kill the King and his Noble Progeny, and in place thereof, to advance one Arabella Stuart: The particulars of the Indictment are these. First, That Raleigh met with Cobham the 9th of June, and had Conference of an Invasion, of a Rebellion, and an Insurrection, to be made by the Kings Subjects, to Depose the King, and to Kill his Children, poor Babes that never gave Offence: Here is Blood, here is a new King and Governour. In our King consists all our Happiness, and the true use of the Gospel, a thing which we all wished to be Settled after the Death of the Queen. Here must be Money to do this, for Money is the Sinew of War. Where should that be had? Count Aremberg must procure it of Philip King of Spain, 5, or 60000 Crowns, and out of this Sum, Raleigh must have 8000; then there must be Friends to effect this. Cobham must go to Albert, Arch-Duke of Austria, for whom Aremberg was Ambassador at that time in England: And what then? He must persuade the Duke to Assist the pretended Title of Arabella. From thence Cobham must go to the King of Spain, and persuade him to Assist the said Title. Since the Conquest, there was never the like Treason. But out of whose Head came it? Out of Raleigh's, who must also advise Cobham to use his Brother Brook to incite the Lady Arabella to write three several Letters, as aforesaid in the Indictment; all this was on the 9th of June. Then three days after, Brook was acquainted with it: After this, Cobham said to Brook, 'twill never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs are taken away. Afterwards Raleigh delivered a Book to Cobham, Treacherously written against the Title of the King. It appears that Cobham took Raleigh, To be either a God, or an Idol. Cobham endeavours to set up a new King, or Governor. God forbid, mine Eyes should ever see so unhappy a Chance.

As for the Lady Arabella, she, upon my Conscience, hath no more Title to the Crown than I have; which, before God, I utterly Renounce.

Cobham, a Man bred in England, hath no Experience abroad.

Raleigh

The Arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh.

Raleigh, a Man of great Wit Military and a Sword-Man.

Now whether of these Persons was Bred in a hollow Tree, I leave to them to speak of, who can speak far better than my self.

Sir Edward Cook, the Kings Attorney. I must first, before I come to the Cause, give one Caution, because we shall often mention Persons of eminent Places, some of them great Monarchs: Whatever we say of them, we shall but Repeat what others have said of them; I mean the Capital Offenders in the Confession: we professing Law must speak Reverently of Kings and Potentates. I perceive these Honourable Lords, and the rest of this great Assembly, are come to hear what hath been scattered upon the Wreck of Rumors; we carry a Just mind, to Condemn no Man but upon plain Evidence. Here is Mischief, Mischief in Summo Grado, Exorbitant Mischief. My Speech shall chiefly touch these three Points; Imitation, Supplantation, and Defence.

The Imitation of Evil ever exceeds the Precedent, as on the contrary Imitation of good, ever comes short. Mischief cannot be supported, but by Mischief: Yea, it will so multiply, that it will bring all to Confusion. Mischief is ever underprop'd by falsehood of foul Practices. Because all these things did concur in these Treasons, you shall understand the Main, as before you did the Bye.

The Treason of the Bye, consisteth in these Points: First, That the Lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the rest, intended by Force in the Night, to Surprize the Kings Court, which was a Rebellion in the Heart, of the Realm, yea, in the Heart of the Heart, in the Court. They intended to make him, that is a Sovereign, subject to their Power, purposing to open the Doors with Muskets and Calivers, and to take also the Prince and Council. Then under the Kings Authority, to carry the King to the Tower, and to make a State of the Admiral, when they had the King there, to Exort three things from him.

First, A Pardon for all their Treasons. Secondly, A Toleration of the Romish Superstition: Which, their Eyes shall sooner fall out, than they shall ever see, for the King hath spoken these words in the hearing of many (I will lose the Crown and my Life, before ever I will alter Religion.)

And, Thirdly, To remove Councelors: In the Room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have placed one Watson a Priest, absurd in Humanity, and ignorant in Divinity. Brooks, of whom I will speak nothing, Lord Treasurer; the great Secretary must be Markham. A hole must be found in my Lord Chief Justices Coat.

Grey must be Earl Marshal, and Master of the Horse, because he would have a Table in the Court: Marry, he would Advance the Earl of Worcester to a higher Place; all this cannot be done without a Multitude.

Therefore Watson the Priest telleth a Resolute Man, That the King was in danger of Puritans and Jesuites; so to bring him in blind-fold into the Action: Saying, that the King is no King till he be Crowned, therefore every Man might Right his own Wrongs; but he is Rex Natus, his Dignity Descends as well as yours, my Lords.

Then Watson imposeth a Blasphemous Oath, that they should Swear to defend the Kings Person, to keep secret what was given them in Charge, and seek all Ways and Means to Advance the Catholick Religion. Then they intend to fend for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the Kings Name, to the Tower, lest they should make any Resistance, then to make Hostages of them; and to enjoyn them to provide for them Victuals and Munition. Grey, because the King removed before Midsummer, had a further Reach, to get a company of Sword-Men to assist the Action: Therefore he would stay, till he had obtained a Regiment from Offend. So you see, these Treasons were like Sampson's Foxes, which were joyned in their Tails, though their Heads were severed.

Raleigh. I pray remember, I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treason of the Priest.

Attorney. You are not: You shall observe three things in the Treasons. First, They had a Watch-word (the Kings safety) their pretence was Bonum in se, their intent was Malum in se.

Secondly, They avouched Scripture, both the Priests had, Scriptum est; perverting and ignorantly mistaking the Scriptures.

Thirdly, They avouched the Common Law to prove, that he was no King till he was Crowned, alledging a Statute of 13. Eli. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the course of all Traitors.

In the 20th of Edward the 2d. Isabella the Queen, and the Lord Mortimer, gave out, that the Kings Person was not safe, for the good of the Church and Commonwealth.

The Bishop of Carlisle did Preach on this Text (My Head is grieved) meaning by the Head, the King; that when the Head began to be Negligent, the People might reform what is amiss.

3d. Henry 4th. Sir Roger Glarindon accompanied with two Priests, gave out, that Richard the 2d was Alive, when he was Dead.

Edward

Edward the 3d caused Mortimers Head to be cut off, for giving counsel to Murder the King.

The 3. Hen. 7. Sir Henry Stanly found the Crown in the Dust and let it on the Kings Head, when Fitzwater and Garret, told him that Edward the 5th was alive, he said, If I be alive, I will assist him. But this cost him his Head.

Edmond de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, killed a Man in the Reign of King Henry the 7th, for which the King would have him hold his hand at the Bar, and then Pardoned him. Yet he took such offence thereat, that he sent to the Noblemen, to help to Reform the Common-wealth; and then said, he would go to France and get Power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treason, and discovered Windon and others, that were Attainted.

Temp. Eliz. Appleyard, a Traytor in Norfolk, said a Man must have two Accusers. Helmes was the Man that accused him; but Mr. J. Just. Catlin said, that that Statute was not in force at that day, his words were thrust her into the Ditch.)

Throgmorton, in the 12th, or 20th. (Queene the Statute) speaking of Accusers, maketh this difference: An Accuser is a speaker, by Report, when a Witness can speak nothing but by his own Report.

If a Man do accuse himself, it is more forcible than many Witnesses. So then, so much by way of Imitation. This is the way of all Proceedings, there is Treason in the Heart, in the Hand, in the Mouth, in Consummation.

The Wisdom of the Law meeteth with them all, Corda, Ore, Progressione, Consummatione; that which is in Corda, is the Root. You must take away Treason in the Root, in the Bud, in the Blossom.

Now I come to your Charge, you of the Jury, in Determinatione finis, and Electione mediocrum. The greatness of Treason is to be considered in these two things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediocrum; this Treason excelleth in both, for that it was to Destroy the King and his Progeny. These Treasons are said to be Crimen lese Majestatis, this goeth further, and may be termed Crimen extirpanda Regie Majestatis & totius Progeniei sue. I shall not need, my Lords, to speak any thing concerning the King, nor of the Bounty and Sweetness of his Nature, whose Thoughts are Innocent, whose Words are full of Wisdom and Learning, and whose Works are full of Honour; although it be a true saying, Nunquam nimis quod nunquam satis. But to whom do you bear your Malice? to the Children?

Raleigh. To whom speak you this? You tell me News I never heard of.

Attorney. Oh Sir, do I! I will prove you the Notorious Traytor that ever came to Bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: as you Sir Walter Raleigh, have followed them of the Bye in Imitation; for I will charge you with the words.

Raleigh. Your words cannot Condemn me, my Innocency is my Defence: Prove one of these things wherewith you have Charged me, and I will confess the whole Indictment; and that I am the Horrible Traytor that ever lived, and worthy to be Crucified with a Thousand thousand Torments.

Attorney. Nay, I will prove all: Thou art a Monster, thou hast an English Face, but a Spanish Heart. Now you must have Money: Aremberg was no sooner in England (I Charge thee Raleigh) but thou incited Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to bestow on discontented Persons.

Raleigh. Let me Answer.

Attorney. Thou shalt not.

Raleigh. It concerneth my Life.

Lord Chief Justice Popham, Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney is bought in the General, but when the Kings Council have given the Evidence wholly, you shall Answer every particular.

Attorney. Oh! do I touch you?

Lord Cecil. Mr. Attorney, when you have done with this General Charge, do you not mean to let him answer to every Particular?

Attorney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be Read. Raleigh procured Cobham to go to Aremberg, which he did by his Instigation: Raleigh Supped with Cobham before he went to Aremberg, after Supper, Raleigh conducted him to Durham House; from whence Cobham went with Lawrenny, a Servant of Aremberg's, unto him, and went in by a Back-way, Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertain'd this Motion, for he had four Letters from Raleigh. Aremberg answered, and promised it should be performed, but knew not to whom it should be distributed. Cobham and Lawrenny came back to Durham House, where they found Raleigh. Cobham and Raleigh went up, and left Lawrenny below, where they had secret Conference in a Gallery, and after Cobham and Lawrenny departed from Raleigh. Your Reason was Peace! What is that? Spanish Invasion, Scottish Subversion. And again, you are not a fit Man to take so much Money for procuring of a Lawful Peace, for Peace procured by Money is Dishonourable. Then Cobham must go to Spain, and return by Ferrey, where where you were Captain: And then because Cobham had not so much Policy, or at least Wickedness as you, he must have your advice for the distribution of the Money. Will you dispose of so good a King Lineally descended? For he came of Elizabeth, the eldest Daughter of Edward the 4th, why then must you set up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a Titular Queen, of whose Title I will speak nothing, but sure you meant to make her a Stale: Ah good Lady! you could mean her no good.

Raleigh. You tell me News, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Oh Sir! I am the more large, because I know with whom I deal: For we have to deal to Day with a Man of Wit.

Raleigh. Did I ever speak with this Lady?

Attorney. I will Track you out before I have done: English Men will not be lead by perswasion of Words, but they must have Books to perswade.

Raleigh. The Book was Written by a Man of your Profession, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. I would not have you Impatient.

Raleigh. Methinks you fall out with your self, I say nothing.

Attorney. By this Book, you would perswade Men that he is not the Lawful King. Now let us consider some Circumstances: You know my Lord Cobham (for whom we all Lament, and Rejoyce; Lament in that his House, which hath stood so long Unspotted, is now Ruinated: Rejoyce, in that his Treasons are Revealed) is neither Politician nor Sword-Man; Raleigh was united in the Cause with him, and therefore cause of his Destruction. Another Circumstance is, the secret Contriving of it. Humphrey Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treason, Raleigh hath his Machivilian Policy, made a Sanctuary for Treason. He must talk with none but Cobham, because (saith he) one Witness can never Condemn me. For Brook said unto Sir Griffith Markham, take heed how you do make my Lord Cobham acquainted; for whatsoever he knoweth, Raleigh the Witch, will get it out of him. As soon as Raleigh was Examined on one Point of Treason concerning my Lord Cobham, he wrote to Cobham thus: I have been Examined of you, and confessed nothing. Further, you sent to him by your trusty Francis Kemish, that one Witness could not Condemn; and therefore bad his Lordship be of good Courage. Came this out of Cobham's Quiver? No: But out of Raleighs Machivilian and Devilish Policy. Yea, but Cobham did retract it? Why then did you urge it? Now then see the most horrible Practices, that ever came out of the bottomless Pit of the lowest Hell. After that Raleigh had intelligence that Cobham had Accused him, he endeavoured to have Intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young Sir John Peyton: But I think it was the Error of his Youth.

Raleigh. The Lords told me, else I had not been sent to the Tower.

Attorney. Then Cobham, by the Instigation of Raleigh, entered into these Actions: So that the Question will be, Whether you are not the Principallest Traytor, and he would nevertheless have entered into it? Why did Cobham retract all that same? First, Because Raleigh was so Odious, he thought he should fare the worse for his sake. Secondly, he thought, If he be free, I shall clear my self the better. After this Cobham asked for a Preacher to Confer with, pretending to have Doctor Andrews; but indeed, he meant not to have him, but Mr. Gallows; A Worthy and Reverend Preacher, who can do more with the King (as he said) than any other; that he, seeing his constant denial, might inform the King thereof. Here he plays with the Preacher. If Raleigh could perswade the Lords, that Cobham had no intent to Travel, then he thought all should be well. Here is Forgery. In the Tower Cobham must write to Sir Thomas Vane, a worthy Man, that he meant not to go into Spain: which Letter Raleigh devised in Cobham's Name.

Raleigh. I will wash my hands of the Indictment, and Die a true Man to the King.

Attorney. You are the absolute Traytor that ever was.

Raleigh. Your Phrases will not prove it; Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Cobham writeth a Letter to my Lord Cecil, and doth will Melbis; this Man, to lay it in a Spanish Bible, and to make as though he found it by chance. This was after he had Intelligence with this Viper; then he was false.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me, I never had it.

Attorney. No, my Lord; you had it not; You, my Masters of the Jury, respect not the Wickedness and Hatred of the Man, respect his Cause; if he be Guilty, I know you will have care of it, for the Preservation of the King, the continuance of the Gospel Authorised, and the Good of us all.

Raleigh. I do not hear yet, that you have spoken one word against me, here is no Treason of mine done: If my Lord Cobham be a Traytor, what is that to me?

Attorney. All that he did was by thy Instigation, thou Viper, for I Thou thee, thou Traytor.

The Arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh.

Raleigh. It cometh not a Man of your Quality and Virtue, to call me so: But I take Comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Attorney. Have I angered you?

Raleigh. I am in no case to be angry.

Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney speaketh out of the zeal of his Duty, for the Service of the King, and you for your Life; be Patient on both sides.

Now they proceed to the Reading the Proofs.

The Lord Cobham's

Examination.

'He confesseth he had a Pass-port to go to the Spanish King, intending to go to the Arch-Duke to confer with him about these Practices; and because he knew he had not Money to pay his own Army, from thence he meant to go to Spain, to deal with the King for the 600000 Crowns, and to return by Jersey, and that nothing should be done, until he had spoken with Sir Walter Raleigh for distribution of the Money, to them which were discontented in England. At the first beginning he breathed out Oaths and Exclamations against Raleigh, calling him Villain, and Traytor; saying, He had never entered into these Courses, but by his Instigation, and that he would never let him alone.

Here Mr. Attorney willed the Clerk of the Crown Office, to read over these last words again (he would never let him alone.)

The Lord Cobham's

Examination.

'Besides he spake of Plots and Invasions: Of the Particulars thereof he could not give an Account, though Raleigh and he had Conferred of them, because he was (as he said) Confounded with them. Further, he said, He was afraid of Raleigh, that when he should return by Jersey, that he would have him and the Money to the King. Being Examined of Sir Arthur Gorge, he freed him, saying:

They never durst trust him, but Sir Arthur Savage they intended to use, because they thought him a fit Man.

Raleigh. Let me see the Examination: This is all the Evidence can be brought against me; poor shifts. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you understand this: This is that which must either Condemn, or give me Life; which must Free me, or send my Wife and Children to beg their Bread about the Streets. This is that must prove me a notorious Traytor, or a true Subject to the King. I never saw this Examination before.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and shew you all the Examinations.

Raleigh. At my first Examination by my Lords at Windsor, what I knew of Cobham's practice with Aremberg, I answered Negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I protest before God, I never heard one word of it. If that be proved, let me be Guilty of a Thousand Treasons. It is a strangething you will impute that to me, when I never heard so much as the Name of Arabella Stuart, but only the Name of Arabella.

After being Examined, I told my Lords; that I thought my Lord Cobham had Conferred with Aremberg, I suspected his Visiting of him: For after he departed from me at Durham House, by his own Stairs, and passed over to St. Mary-Saviour's; I knew Lawrence a Merchant, and a Follower of Aremberg, and therefore likely to go unto him. My Lord Cecil asked my Opinion concerning Lawrence; I said, that if you do not Apprehend Lawrence, it is dangerous, he will flee; if you do Apprehend him, you shall give my Lord Cobham notice thereof. I was asked likewise, who was the greatest Man with my Lord Cobham: I answered, I knew no Man so great with him, as young Wyat of Kent.

As soon as Cobham saw my Letter to have discovered his Dealing with Aremberg, in his Fury he accused me, but before he came to the Stair-foot he repented him, and said, he had done me wrong. When he came to the end of his Accusation, he added, That if he had brought this Money to Jersey, that I would have Delivered him to the King. Mr. Attorney, you said this never came out of Cobham's Quiver, he is a simple Man: Is he so simple? No: He hath Dispositions of his own, he will not easily be guided by others, but when he has once taken Head in a Matter, he is not easily drawn from it; he is no Babe. It is strange for me to Devise with Cobham, that he should go to Spain, to persuade the King to Disburse so much Money, he being a Man of no Love in England, and I having resigned my room of chiefest Command, the Wardenship of the Stanneries: It is strange for me, to make my self Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Gade; I knowing England to be in better Estate than ever it was. I knew Scotland United, Ireland Quietted, Denmark Assured, which before was Suspected. I knew, that having a Lady whom Time had Surprized, we had now a lawful Successor. The State of Spain was not unknown known to me. I had Written a Discourse, which I intended to present unto the King, against Peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniards had six Repulles, three in Ireland, and three at Sea, and once in 1588 at Calais, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was Discouraged and Dishonoured. I knew the King of Spain to be the proudest Prince living; but now he cometh Creeping to the King my Master, for Peace. I knew whereas before he had in his Ports 6 or 7 score Sail of Ships, he hath now but Six or Seven. I knew of Twenty Five Millions he had from his Indies, he hath scarce one left. I knew him so Poor, that the Jesuites in Spain, were Feign to Beg at the Church-Door. Was it ever Read or Heard, that any Prince should Disburse so much Money, without a sufficient Pawn? I knew her own Subjects, the Citizens of London, would not Lend her Majesty Money without Lands in Mortgage. I knew the Queen did not Lend the States Money, without Flushing, Brill, and other Towns for a Pawn. And can it be thought, he would let Cobham have so great a Sum?

I never came to the Lord Cobham's, but about matters of his Profit, as the Ordering of his House, Paying of his Servants Board-wages, &c. I had of his when I was Examined, Four Thousand Pounds worth of Jewels for a Purchase; a Pearl of Three Thousand Pound, and a Ring worth Five Hundred Pound: If he had had a fancy to Run away, he would not have left so much to have Purchased a Lease in Fee Farm, I saw him Buy Three Hundred Pounds worth of Books, to send to his Library at Canterbury, and a Cabinet of Three Hundred Pound to give to Mr. Attorney, for drawing the Conveyances and God in Heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to Travel. But for that practice with Arabella, or Letters to Aremberg, or any Discourse with him, or in what Language he spake unto him, if I knew any of these things, I would absolutely confess the Indictment, and acknowledge my self worthy a Thousand Deaths.

Cobham's Examination Read.

The Lord Cobham being required to Subscribe to an Examination, there was shewed a Note under Raleigh's hand, whereupon, when he had perused it, he pawled, and after brake forth into these Speeches: Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! I will now tell you all the Truth: And then said, His purpose was to go into Flanders, and into Spain; for the Obtaining the aforesaid Money, and that Raleigh had appointed to meet him in Jersey as he returned Home, to be advised of him about the Distribution of the Money. Popham, Lord Chief Justice. When Cobham answered to the Interrogatories, he made scruple to Subscribe, and being urged to it, he said, If he might hear me affirm, that a Person of his Degree ought to set his Hand, he would; I lying then at Richmond, for fear of the Plague, was sent for, and I told he ought to Subscribe; otherwise it were a Contempt of a high Nature: Then he Subscribed. The Lords Questioned with him further, and he shewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my Lord Cecil: He desired to see the Letter again, and then said, Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! whereby I perceived you had not performed that Trust he had reposed in you.

Raleigh. He is as passionate a Man as Lives, for he hath not spared the best Friends he hath in England. My Lords, I take it, he that hath been Examined, hath ever been asked if it be according to his meaning, and then to Subscribe. Methinks, my Lords, when he Accuses a Man, he should give some Account and Reason of it; it is not sufficient to say, we Talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham some Arguments, whereby to persuade the King of Spain, and answer his Objections. I knew Westmorland and Bobbuck, Men of other Understandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their Bread.

Sir Thomas Fowler, one of the Jury. Did Sir Walter Raleigh write a Letter to my Lord before he was Examined concerning him?

Attorney. Yes.

Lord Cecil. I am in great Dispute with my self, to speak in the Case of this Gentleman: A former Dearness between me and him tied to firm a Knot of my Conceit of his Virtues, now broken by a Discovery of his Imperfections. I protest, did I serve a King that I knew would be displeased with me for speaking, in this Case I would speak, whatever came of it: But seeing he is compacted of Piety and Justice, and one that will not mislike of any Man for speaking a Truth, I will Answer your Question.

Sir Walter Raleigh was itaid by me at Windsor, upon the first News of Copley, that the Kings Person should be Surprised by my Lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I suspected Cobham, then I doubted Raleigh to be a partaker. I speak not this, that it should be thought, I had greater Judgment than the rest of my Lords, in making this hast to have him Examined; Raleigh following to Windsor, I met with him upon the Tarraz, and willed him as from the King, to stay, saying, The Lords had something to say to him: Then he was Examined, but not concerning my Lord Cobham, but of the Surprising Treason, what he said of Cobham, he delivered unto us in such sort as of a Brother he might: We sent for my Lord Cobham to Richmond, where he stood upon his Justification, and his Quality; sometimes being Froward, he said he was not bound to subscribe, wherewith we made the King acquainted. Cobham said, if my Lord Chief Justice would say it were a Contempt, he would Subscribe, wherof being resolved, he Subscribed. There was a Light given to Aremberg, that Lawreny was Examined, but that Raleigh knew that Cobham was Examined, is more than I know.

G Examined,

Raleigh. If my Lord Cobham had trusted me in the Main, was not I as fit a Man to be trusted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Raleigh did by Letters acquaint us, that my Lord Cobham had sent Lawreny to Aremberg, when he knew not he had any Dealings with him.

Lord H. How. It made for you, if Lawreny had been only acquainted with Cobham, and not with you. But you knew his whole Estate, and were acquainted with Cobham's Practice with Lawreny; it was known before that Lawreny depended on Aremberg.

Attorney. 1. Raleigh protesteth against the Surprising Treason. 2. That he knew not of the Matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, Sir Walter, with a matter of Falshood: You say, you suspected the intelligence that Cobham had with Aremberg, by Lawreny.

Raleigh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but such as might be Warranted.

Attorney. Then it was but lawful Suspicion. But to that whereas you said, that Cobham had accused you on Passion, I answer three Ways. 1. I observed when Cobham said, Let me see the Letter again; he pawed and when he did see that Count Aremberg was touched, he cried out, Oh Traitor! Oh Villain! now will I Confess the whole truth. 2. The Accusation of a Man on Hear-say, is nothing: Would he Accuse himself on Passion, and Ruinate his Cause and Posterity, out of Malice to accuse you?

3. Could this be out of Passion? Mark the manner of it: Cobham had told this at least two Months before to his Brother Brook, You are Fools, you are on the Bye, Raleigh and I are on the Main, we mean to take away the King and his Cubs; this he delivered two Months before. So mark the manner of the Matter, he would not turn the Weapon against his own Bosom, and accuse himself to accuse you.

Raleigh. Hath Cobham confessed that?

Lord Chief Justice. This is spoken by Mr. Attorney, to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of Passion.

Raleigh. Let it be proved that Cobham said so.

Attorney. Cobham saith, He was along time doubtful of Raleigh, that he would fend him to the King. Did Cobham fear least you would betray him in Jersey? Then of necessity there must be Trust between you. No Man can betray a Man, but he that is trusted, in my understanding. This is the greatest Argument to prove, that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Raleigh hath a deeper reach than to make himself, as he said, Robin Hood, a Kett, or Gade, yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traytor; they say he was an Out-law. And whereas he saith, that our King is not only more Wealthy and Potent than his Predecessors, but also more Politick and Wise, so that he could have no hope to prevail. I answer, There is no King so Potent, Wife and Active, but he may be overtaken through Treason. Whereas you say Spain is so Poor, Discouraging so largely thereof, it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been so well acquainted with the State of Spain. Besides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joynd, you might have hope to prevail. For his six Overthrows, I answer, He hath the more Malice, because Repulses breed desire of Revenge. Then you say, you never talked with Cobham but about Leases, and Letting Lands, and Ordering his House; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchen, &c. If you had fallen on your Knees at first, and Confessed the Treason, it had been better for you. You say, he meant to have given me a Cabinet of Three Hundred Pound, perhaps he thought by those means, to have Anticipated me therewith. But you say, all these are Circumstances. I answer, all this Accusation in Circumstance is true: here now I might appeal to my Lords, that you take hold of this, that he Subscribed not to the Accusation.

Lord H. How. Cobham was not then pressed to Subscribe.

Attorney. His Accusation being Testified to the Lords, is of as great Force, as if he had Subscribed. Raleigh saith again, if the Accuser be alive, he must be brought Face to Face to speak, and alledges 25. Edw. 3. That there must be sufficient Witnesses that must be brought Face to Face before the Accused, and alledgeth 10. and 13. Eliz.

Raleigh. You try me by the Spanish Inquisition, if you proceed only by the Circumstances without two Witnesses.

Attorney. This is a Treasonable speech, Raleigh.

Raleigh. Everete hominem Justum in causa sua, Injustum est: Good my Lords, let it be proved either by the Laws of the Land, or by the Laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witnesses appointed; yet I will not stand to defend this Point in Law, if the King will have it so: it is no rare thing to be falsely Accused. A Judge Condemned a Woman in Sarum, for killing her Husband, on the Testimony of one Witness; afterwards his Man confessed the Murder, when she was Executed. Who after, being toucht in Conscience for the Judgment, was used to say, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in Vita sua Pargaret. It is also Commanded by the Scripture, Dent. 17. In Ore duorum aut trium Testium, &c. and 19. Non stabit unus testis, contra aliquem, &c.

If Christ requirer it, as it appeareth, Matth. 18. If St. Paul, 2 Cor. 13. St. John 8c. If by the Statute, Civil Law, and Gods Word, it be required that there must be two Witnesses at the least, bear with me if I decline one.

I would not desire to Live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings: I had been a Slave, a Villain, a Fool, if I had endeavoured to set up Arabella, and refused so Gracious a Lord and Sovereign: But, urge your Proofs.

Lord Chief Justice. You offered Questions on divers Statutes, all which mention two Accusers in case of Indictments; you have deceived your self, for the Laws of 25. Ed. 3. and 5. Ed. 6. are Repeal'd. It sufficeth now if there be Proofs made either under Hand, or by Testimony of Witnesses, or by Oaths; it needs not the Subscription of the Party, so there be Hands of Credible Men, to Testifie the Examination.

Raleigh. It may be an Error in me, and if those Laws be Repeal'd, yet I hope the Equity of those Laws remains still, but if you Affirm it, it must be a Law to Posterity, the Proof of the Common Law is by Witnesses and Jury, let Cobham be here, let him speak it: Call my Accuser before my Face, and I have done.

Attorney. Scientia sceleris est mixta ignorantia: You have read the Letter of the Law, but understand it not. Here was your Anchor-hold, and your Randevowze, you trust to Cobham, either Cobham must accuse you, or not accuse you; if he did, then it would not hurt you, because he is but one Witness, if he did not, then you are safe.

Raleigh. If ever I read word of the Law, or Statute before I was Prisoner in the Tower, God Confound me.

Attorney. Now I come to Prove the Circumstances of the Accusation to be true, Cobham confessed he had a Pass-port to Travel, hereby intending to present Overtures to the Arch-Duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have Conference with the King for Money: You say he promised to come Home by Jersey, to make Merry with you and your Wife.

Raleigh. I said, in his return from France, not Spain.

Attorney. Further, in his Examination, he saith nothing could be set down for the Distribution of the Money to the Discontented, without Conference with Raleigh. You said it should have been for procurement of Peace, but it was for raising Rebellion. Further, Cobham saith, he would never have entered into these Courses, but by your Instigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your Schollar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots, that is enough for you to do, that are his Master: You intended to ruin Sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be a Honest and True Gentleman, but not Sir Arthur Gorge.

Raleigh. All this is one Accusation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accusation he never Subscribed nor Avouched it. I beseech you, my Lords, let Cobham be sent for, charge him on his Oath, on his Allegiance to the King; if he Affirm it, I am Guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accusation of my Lord Cobham, it is the Evidence against you, must it not be of Force without his Subscription? I desire to be resolved by the Judges, whether by the Law it is not a forcible Argument of Evidence.

The Judges. It was.

Raleigh. The King at his Coronation, is sworn In omnibus Judiciis suis Aequitatem, non Rigorem Legis observare: By the Rigour and Cruelty of the Law, it may be a forcible Evidence.

Lord Chief Justice. That is not the Rigour of the Law, but the Justice of the Law, else when a Man hath made a plain Accusation, by Practice he might be brought to Retract it again.

Raleigh. Oh my Lord! you may use Equity.

Lord Chief Justice. That is from the King, you are to have Justice from us.

Andrews. The Law is, if the Matter be proved to the Jury, they must find you Guilty; for Cobham's Accusation is not only against you, there are other things sufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that Sir Walter Raleigh is satisfied, that Cobham's Subscription is not necessary: I pray you Mr. Attorney go on.

Raleigh. Good Mr. Attorney be patient, and give me leave.

Lord Cecil. An unnecessary Patience is a G 2 hinhindrance, let him go on with his Proofs, and then Refel them.

Raleigh, I would answer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a Table, and Pen, and Ink, you shall.

Then Paper and Ink was given him.

Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter, which the Lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the effect of his former Examination, further saying, I have disclosed all; to Accuse any falsely, were to burthen my own Conscience.

Attorney. Read Copies Confession the 8th of June, he saith, He was offered a 1000 Crowns to be in this Action.

Here Watsons Additions were read.

"The great Mass of Money from the "Count was impossible, saith Brook, &c.

Brook's his Confession read,

"There have Letters passed, saith he, between Cobham and Artemberg, for a great Sum of Money, to Assist a second Action, for the Surprising of his Majesty.

Attorney. It is not possible, it was of Passion; For it was in Talk before three Men being severally Examined, who agreed in the sum to be bestowed on disaffected Persons. That Grey should have 120000 Crowns, and Raleigh should have 8000, or 10000 Crowns.

Cobham's Examination, July 18.

"If the Money might be procured (saith he) then a Man may give Penfions. Being asked if a Pension should not be given to his Brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrence's Examination.

"Within five Days after Artemberg arrived, Cobham resorted unto him. That Night that Cobham went to Artemberg with Lawrence, Raleigh Supped with him.

Attorney. Raleigh must have his part of the Money, the afore now he is a Traytor. The Crown shall never stand one Year on the Head of the King (my Master) if a Traytor may not be Condemned by Circumstances. For if A. tells B. and B. tells C. and C. D. &c. you shall never prove Treason by two Witnesses.

Raleigh's Examination was Read. He confesseth Cobham offered him 8000 Crowns, which he was to have for the furtherance of the Peace, between England and Spain; and that he should have it within three Days. To which, he said, he gave this Answer, When I see the Money, I will tell you more; for I had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle Concepts, and therefore made no account thereof.

Raleigh. The Attorney hath made a long

Narration of Copley, and the Priests, which concerns me nothing, neither know I how Cobham was altered. For he told me, if I would agree to the Peace, he would get me 8000 Crowns. I asked him, Who shall have the rest of the Money? He said, I will offer such a Noble-Man (who was not named) some of the Money. I said, he will not be perverted by you, and will extremely hate you for such a Motion. Let me be Pinched to Death with hot Irons, if ever I knew there was any Intention to bestow the Money on Discontented Persons. I had made a Discourse against the Peace, and would have Printed it: If Cobham changed his mind, if the Priests, if Brook had any such intent, what is that to me? They must answer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremberg came, that is difference of time.

Sergeant Philips. Raleigh confesseth the Matter, but avoideth it, by distinguishing of Times. You said it was offered you before the coming of Aremberg; which is false. For you being Examined whether you should have such Money of Cobham, or not: You said yea, and that you should have it within two or three Days. Nemo moriturus presumitur mentiri.

Lord Hen. How. Alledg me any Ground or Cause; wherefore you gave ear to my Lord Cobham for receiving Penfions, in Matters you had not to deal with?

Raleigh. Could I stop my Lord Cobham's Mouth.

Lord Cecil. Sir Walter Raleigh preffeth, that my Lord Cobham should be brought Face to Face. If he ask things of Favour and Grace, they must come only from him that gives them. If we Sit here as Commissioners, how shall we be satisfied, whether he ought to be brought, unless we hear the Judges speak?

Lord Chief Justice. This thing cannot be granted, for then a number of Treasons should flourish: The Accuser may be drawn by Practice, whilst he is in Person.

Judge Gawdy. The Statute you speak of, concerning two Witnesses, in case of Treason is found to be inconvenient; therefore by another Law it was taken away.

Raleigh. The common Trial of England, is by Jury and Witnesses.

Lord Chief Justice. No, by Examination: If three Conspire a Treason, and they all Confess it; here is never a Witness, yet they are Condemned.

Judge Warburton. I marvel, Sir Walter, that you being of such Experience and Wit, should stand on this Point; for so, many Horse-stealers may escape, if they may not be Condemned without Witnesses. If one should should rush into the Kings Privy-Chamber, whilst he is alone, and Kill the King (which God forbid) and this Man be met coming with his Sword drawn all bloody; Shall not he be Condemned to Death? My Lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been Labour'd withal; and to fave you, his old Friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath said.

Raleigh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

Lord Chief Justice. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Raleigh. Indeed where the Accuser is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuser may, he is alive, and in the House. Susanna had been Condemned, if Daniel had not cried out: Will you condemn an innocent Israelite, without Examination or Knowledge of the truth? Remember, it is absolutely the Commandment of God: If a false Witness rise up, you shall cause him to be brought before the Judges, if he be found false, he shall have the Punishment which the Accused should have had. It is very sure for my Lord to Accuse me is my certain Danger, and a means to Excuse himself.

Lord Chief Justice. There must not such a Gap be opened for the Destruction of the King, as would be, if we should grant this. You Plead hard for your self, but the Laws Plead as hard for the King. I did never hear that Course to be taken in a Cafe of Treason. There hath been Intelligence between you, and what underhand Practices there may be, I know not. If the Circumstances agree not with the Evidence, we will not Condemn you.

Raleigh. The King desires nothing but the knowledge of the Truth, and would have no advantage taken by Severity of the Law. If ever we had a Gracious King, now we have! I hope, as he is, such are his Ministers. If there be but a Trial of five Marks at the Common Law, a Witness must be depofed. Good my Lords, let my Accuser come Face to Face, and be depofed.

Lord Chief Justice. You have no Law for it: God forbid any Man should accuse himself, upon his Oath.

Attorney. The Law presumes, a Man will not accuse himself to accuse another. You are an odious Man: For Cobham thinks his Cause the worse, that you are in it. Now you shall hear of some Stirs to be raised in Scotland.

Part of Copies Examination.

"Also Watson told me, that a special Person told him, that Aremberg offered to him

"a Thousand Crowns; and that Brook said, 'the Stirs in Scotland came out of Raleigh's Head.

Raleigh. Brook hath been taught his Lesson.

Lord H. How. This Examination was taken before me; Did I teach him his Lesson? Raleigh. I protest before God, I meant it not by any Privy Councillor.

Raleigh's Examination.

"The way to Invade England, were to begin with Stirs in Scotland.

Raleigh. I think so still: I have spoken it to divers of the Lords, by way of Discourse and Opinion.

Attorney. Now let us come to those words of Destroying the King and his Cubs.

Raleigh. O barbarous! If they like unnatural Villains, should use those words, shall I be Charged with them? I will not hear it, I was never false to the Crown of England. I have spent 40000 Crowns of mine own, against the Spanish Faction, for the Good of my Country. Do you bring the words of these Hellish Spiders, Clark, Watson, and others, against me?

Attorney. Thou halt a Spanish Heart, and thy self art a Spider of Hell, for thou confesseth the King to be a most Sweet and Gracious Prince, and yet halt Conspired against him.

Watsons Examination Read.

"He said, that George Brook told him twice, That his Brother, the Lord Cobham, said to him, that you are but on the Bye; but Raleigh and I are on the Main.

Brook's Examination Read.

"Being askt what was meant by this far gone the Bye and the Main, he said, That the Lord Cobham told him, that Grey and others, were in the Bye, he and Raleigh were on the Main. Being askt what Examination his Brother made of these words, he said, he is loath to Repeat it. And after faith, by the Main, was meant, the taking away of the King and his Issue. And thinks on his Conscience, it was infused into his Brother's Head by Raleigh.

Cobham's Examination Read.

"Being askt if ever he had said, It will never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs were taken away. He said, he had answered before, and that he would answer no more to the Point.

Raleigh. I am not named in all this: There is a Law of two Accusers, one of his own Knowledge, another by Hear-say.

Earl of Suffolk. See the Case of Arnold.

Lord Chief Justice. It is the Case of Sir William Thomas, and Sir Nicholas Arnold.

Raleigh. If this may be, you will have any Mans Life in a Week.

Attorney. Raleigh saith, That Cobham was in a Passion when he said so. Would he tell his Brother any thing of Malice against Raleigh, whom he loved as his life?

Raleigh. Brook never loved me; until his Brother had accused me, he said nothing.

Lord Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think, that Brook accused you, he was only in the Surprising Treason; for by accusing you, he should accuse his Brother.

Raleigh. He doth not care much for that.

Lord Cecil. I must Judge the best. The Accusation of his Brother was not Voluntary; he pared every thing, as much as he could, to save his Brother.

Cobham's Examination Read.

"He saith, he had a Book Written against the Title of the King, which he had of Raleigh, and that he gave it to his Brother: Raleigh said, it was foolishly Written.

Attorney. After the King came within Twelve Miles of London, Cobham never came to see him, and intended to Travel without seeing the Queen, and the Prince. Now in this Discontentment, you gave him the Book, and he gave it to his Brother.

Raleigh. I never gave it him, he took it off my Table. For I well remember, a little before that time, I received a Challenge from Sir Amias Preston, and for that I did intend to Answer it, I resolved to leave my Estate settled, therefore laid out all my loose Papers, amongst which was this Book.

Attorney. I observe there was Intelligence between you and Cobham, in the Tower, for after he said, it was against the Kings Title, he denied it again.

Sir William Wade. First my Lord Cobham confesseth it, and after he had subscribed it, he revoked it again: To me he always said, that the Drift of it was against the Kings Title.

Raleigh. I protest before God, and his Works, I gave him not the Book.

Nota. Sir Robert Wroth speaketh, or Whispereth something secretly.

Attorney. My Lords, I must complain of Sir Robert Wroth; he says this Evidence is not Material.

Sir Robert Wroth. I never spake the words,

Attorney. Let Mr. Serjeant Philips testify, whether he heard them.

One of the Commissioners then said, I will give my word for Sir Robert Wroth.

Sir Robert Wroth. I will speak as truly as you, Mr. Attorney, for by God, I never spake it.

Lord Chief Justice. Wherefore should this Book be Burnt?

Raleigh. I Burned it not.

Serj. Philips. You presented your Friend with it, when he was discontented. It it had been before the Queens Death, it had been a less matter; but you gave it him presently when he came from the King, which was the time of his discontentment.

Raleigh. Here is a Book supposed to be Treasonable; I never Read it, nor Urged it.

Attorney. This is cunning.

Raleigh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh against me is probable.

Attorney. Lord Cobham saith, that Kemish came to him with a Letter torn, and did with him not to be dismissed, for one Witness could not hurt him.

Raleigh. This poor Man hath been clove Prisoner these Eighteen Weeks; he was offered the Rack to make him Confess. I never sent any such Message to him, I only Writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attorney; having of his at that time a great Pearl, and a Diamond.

Lord H. Howard. No Circumstance moveth me more, than this. Kemish was never on the Rack, the King gave Charge, that no Rigour should be used.

Commissioners. We protest before God, there was no such Matter intended, to our knowledges.

Raleigh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack sent for, and he threatened with it?

Sir William Wade. When Mr. Solicitor and my self Examined Kemish, we told him he deserved the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commissioners. It was more than we knew.

Cobham's Examination Read.

"He saith, Kemish brought him a Letter from Raleigh, and that part which concerning the Lords of the Council, was rent out; that he was Examined, and cleared him of all; and that the Lord H. Howard said, because he was discontent, he was fit to be in the Action. And further, that Kemish said to him from Raleigh, that he should be of good Comfort, for the Witnesses could not condemn a Man for Treason.

Lord Cecil. Cobham was asked when he heard from you, he said, Every Day.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. Kemish added more, I never bad him speak these words.

Nota. Mr. Attorney offered to interrupt him.

Lord Cecil. It is his last Discourse. Give him leave Mr. Attorney.

Raleigh. I am accused concerning Arabella, concerning Money out of Spain. My Lord Chief Justice saith, a Man may be Condemned with one Witness, yea, without any Witnesses. Cobham is Guilty of many things, Conscientia mille Testes. He hath accused himself, what can he hope for but Mercy? My Lords, vouchsafe me this Grace. Let him be brought, being alive, and in the House; let him avouch any of these things, I will confess the whole Indictment, and Renounce the Kings Mercy.

Lord Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near Kinwoman of the Kings. Let us not Scandal the innocent by confusion of Speech: She is as innocent of all these things as for any Man here; only she received a Letter from Cobham, to prepare her; which she Laught at, and immediately sent it to the King. So far was she from Discontentment, that she Laught him to scorn. But you see how far the Count of Aremberg did consent.

The Lord Admiral (Nottingham) being by in a Standing, with the Lady Arabella, spake to the Court.

The Lady doth here Protest upon her Salvation, that she never dealt in any of these things.

Lord Cecil. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come to speak with her, and gave her to understand, that there were some about the King, that laboured to Disgrace her; she doubted it was but a Trick. But Brook saith, his Brother moved him to procure Arabella to Write Letters to the King of Spain: But he saith, he never did it.

Raleigh. The Lord Cobham hath accused me, you see in what manner he hath Forsworn it. Were it not for his Accusation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the Letter which Lawrence brought to him from Aremberg. Let me speak for my Life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not Excuse me. If you grant me not this Favour, I am strangely used. Campion was not denied to have his Accusers face to face.

Lord Chief Justice. Since he must needs have Justice, the Acquitting of his old Friend may move him to speak otherwise than the truth.

Raleigh. I have been the infuser of all these Treasons into him. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this, he said I have been the Cause of all his Miseries, and the Destruction of his House; and that all Evil hath happened unto him, by my wicked Council. If this be true, whom hath he cause to Accuse, and to be Revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as Revengful, as any Man on Earth.

Attorney. He is a Party, and may not come, the Law is against it.

Raleigh. It is a Toy to tell me of Law. I defie Law, I stand on the Fact.

Lord Cecil. I am afraid my often Speech (who am inferior to my Lords here present) will make the World think, I delight to hear my self Talk. My affection to you, Sir Walter Raleigh, was not extinguished, but slaked, in regard of your defects. You know the Law of the Realm, (to the which your Mind doth not content) that my Lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Raleigh. He may be, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. But do you Challenge it?

Raleigh. No.

Lord Cecil. You say that my Lord Cobham, your main Accuser, must come to accuse you. You say, he hath Retracted: I say many Particulars are not Retracted, What the Validity of all this is, is merely left to the Jury. Let me ask you this, if my Lord Cobham will say, you were the only Instigator of him to proceed in the Treasons, dare you put your self on this?

Raleigh. If he will speak it before God and the King, that ever I knew of Arabella's Matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the Surprising Treason; I put my self on it, Gods Will and the Kings be done with me.

Lord H. Howard. How if he speak things Equivalent to that you have said?

Raleigh. Yes, in a main Point.

Lord Cecil. If he say, you have been the Instigator of him to deal with the Spanish King, had not the Council cause to draw you hither?

Raleigh. I put my self on it.

Lord Cecil. Then, Sir Walter Raleigh, think on God, and prepare your self; for I do verily believe, my Lords will Prove this. Excepting your Faults (I call them no worse) by God, I am your Friend. The Heat and Passion in you, and the Attorney's Zeal in the Kings Service, makes me speak thus.

Raleigh. Whosoever is the Workman, it is reason he should give Account of his Work to the Work-Master. But let it be Proved that he acquainted me with any of his Conference with Aremberg: he would surely have given me some Account.

Lord Cecil. That follows not. If I set you on Work, and you give me no Account; am I therefore Innocent?

Attorney

Attorney. For Arabella, I said she was never acquainted with the Matter. Now that Raleigh had Conference in all these Treasons, it is manifest; The Jury hath heard the Matter. There is one Dyer, a Pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal Gentleman, who asked him if the King of England were Crowned yet? To whom he answered, I think not yet, but he shall be shortly. Nay, saith the Portugal, that shall he never be, for his Throat will be cut by Don Raleigh, and Don Cobham, before he be Crowned.

Dyer was called and Sworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a Merchants House in Lisbon, to see a Boy that I had there; there came in a Gentleman into the House, and inquiring what Countryman I was, I said an English-Man: Whereupon he asked me, if the King were Crowned? And I answered, that I hoped he should be so shortly. Nay, saith he, he shall never be Crowned, for Don Raleigh, and Don Cobham, will cut his Throat ere that Day come.

Raleigh. What infer you upon this?

Attorney. That your Treason hath Wings.

Raleigh. If Cobham did practice with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the Duke of Buckingham with Pack Straw's Treason, but that it was to Countenance his Treason?

Consider, you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no Cause so doubtful, which the Kings Council cannot make good against the Law. Consider my Disability, and their Ability: They Prove nothing against me, only they bring the Accusation of my Lord Cobham, which he hath Lamented and Repented as heartily, as if it had been for a horrible Murder. For he knew, that all this Sorrow which should come to me, is by his means. Presumptions must proceed from Precedent, or Subsequent Facts. I have spent 40000 Crowns against the Spaniard. I had not Purchased 40 Pound a Year. If I had Died in Guiana, I had not left 300 Marks a Year to my Wife and Son. I that have always Condemned the Spanish Faction, me-thinks it is a strange thing that now I should affect it! Remember what St. Austin says, Sic Judicatur tanquam ab alio mox Judicandi; unus iudex, unum Tribunal. If you would be contented on Presumptions delivered, to be Slaughtered, to have your Wife and Children turned into the Streets to beg their Bread; If you would be contented to be so judged, Judg of of me.

Serj. Philips I hope to make this so clear, as that the Wit of Man shall have no Colour to answer it. The Matter is Treason in the highest Degree, the end to Deprive the King of his Crown. The particular Treasons are these: First, To raise up Rebellion; and, to effect that, to procure Money; to raise up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a Treasonable Book against the Kings right to the Crown; the purpose, to take the Life of his Majesty and his Issue. My Lord Cobham confesseth Sir Walter Raleigh guilty thereof. The Question is, Whether he be Guilty as joyning with him, or Ignorant of him? The course to Prove this, was by my Lord Cobham's Accusation. If that be true, he is Guilty; if not, he is Clear. So, whether Cobham say true, or Raleigh? That is the Question. Raleigh hath no Answer, but the Shadow of as much Wit, as the Wit of Man can devise. He useth his bare Denial; the denial of a Defendant must not move the Jury. In the Star-Chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in Question, his denial on his Oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in Propria causa. Therefore much less in Matters of Treason. Cobham's Testification against him before then, and since, hath been largely disallowed.

Raleigh. If Truth be Constant, and Constancy be in Truth, Why hath he Forsworn that that he hath said? You have not Proved any one thing by direct Proofs, but all by Circumstances.

Attorney. Have you done? The King must have the last.

Raleigh. Nay, Mr. Attorney, he which speaketh for his Life, must speak last. False Repetitions and Mistakings must not mar my Cause. You should speak Secundum allegata & probata. I appeal to God and the King, Whether Cobham's Accusation be sufficient to Condemn me.

Attorney. The Kings Safety, and your Clearing, cannot agree. I protest, I never knew a clearer Treason.

Raleigh. I never had intelligence with Cobham since he came to the Tower.

Attorney. Go too, I will lay thee upon thy Back, for the Confidential Traytor that ever came at a Bar. Why should you take 8000 Crowns for a Peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not so impatient, good Mr. Attorney, give him leave to speak.

Attorney. If I may not be patiently heard, you will encourage Traytors, and discourage Us. I am the Kings sworn-Servant, and must speak: If he be Guilty he is a Traytor, if not, deliver him.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney sat down and would speak no more, until the Commissioners missioners urged and intreated him to go forward, and then proceeded.

Attorney. You had intelligence with Cobham, within four Days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spanish, and desired Pension of 1500 Pound a Year from Spain that Spain by him might have Intelligence, then Raleigh is a Traytor. He hath taken an Apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my Lord Cobham's Window; the Contents whereof were this. It is doubtful whether me shall be proceeded with or no, perhaps you shall not be tried. This was to get a Retraction. Oh! it was Adam's Apple, whereby the Devil did deceive him. Further, he wrote thus, Do not as my Lord of Essex did, take heed of a Preacher for by his persuasion he confessed, and made himself guilty. I doubt not, but this Day, God shall have as great a Conquest by this Traytor, and the Son of God shall be as much Glorified, as when it was said, Vicisti Galilee; you know my meaning. Though Cobham Retracted, yet he could not rest nor sleep, until he had Confirmed it again. If this be not enough to Prove him a Traytor, the King my Master shall not Live three Years to an end.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney produceth the Lord Cobham's Letter, and as he read it, Inserted some speeches.

I have thought it fit, to set down into thy Lords, wherein I profess on my Soul, to write nothing but the truth. I am come now near to the Period of my Time, therefore I confess the truth before God, and his Angels. Raleigh, four days before I came from the Tower, caused an Apple (Eves Apple) to be thrown in at my Chamber-window; the effect of it was to intreat me to right the Wrong that I had done him, in saying, that I should have come Home by Fersey, which under my Hand to him, I have Retracted. His first Letter I answered not, which was thrown in the same manner, wherein he prayed me to write him a Letter, which I did. He sent me word that the Judges met at Mr. Attorney's House, and that there was good hope the Proceedings against us should be staid; he sent me another time a little Tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Raleigh dealt with me, to procure him a Pension of 1500 Pound a Year, for which he promised that no Action should be against Spain, but he would give knowledge before-hand. He told me the States had Audience with the King. (Ah, is not this a Spanish Heart in an English Body?) He hath been the original Cause of my Ruine; for I had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his intigation. He hath been also the cause of my Discontentment; he advised me, not to be overtaken with Preachers, as Essex was, and that the King would better allow of a constant Denial, than to Accuse any.

Attorney. Oh damnable Atheist! he hath learned some Text of Scripture, to serve his own purpose, but falsely alledged. He counsels him, not to be Counsellied by Preachers, as Essex was: He died the Child of God, God Honoured him at his death; thou wast by when he died, Et Lupus & Turpes instant morientibus urse. He died indeed for his Offence. The King himself spake these words; He that shall say Essex died not for Treason is punishable.

Raleigh. You have heard a strange Tale of a strange Man; he hath Matter enough to me; but the King, and all of you shall Witness by our Deaths, which of us was the Ruine of other. I bid a poor Fellow throw in the Letter at his Window, written to this purpose; You know you have undone me, now write three Lines to justify me. In this I will die, that he hath done me Wrong: Why did not he acquaint me with his Treasons, if I acquainted him with my Dispositions?

Attorney. But what say you now of this Letter?

Raleigh. I say that Cobham is a base Dishonourable poor Soul.

Attorney. Is he Base? I return it into thy Throat, on his behalf: But for thee, he had been a good Subject.

Nota. Here Raleigh pulled a Letter out of his Pocket, which the Lord Cobham had written to him, and desired my Lord Cecil to read it, because he only knew his Hand; the Effect of it was as followeth.

Cobham's Letter of Justification to Raleigh.

"Seeing my self so near my End, for the discharge of my own Conscience, and freeing my self from your Blood, which else will cry Vengeance against me: I protest upon my Salvation, I never Practised with Spain by your Procurement; God so Comfort me in this my Affliction, as you are a true Subject, for any thing that I know. I will say as Daniel, Pernis sum a Sanguine huius. So God have Mercy on my Soul, as I know no Treason by you."

Nota. This was the last Evidence, whereupon a Man that was Sworn, to keep the Jury private. The Jury departed, and staid not a Quarter of an Hour, but returned, and gave their Verdict Guilty.

Serj. Heath demanded Judgment against the Prisoner.

The Arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Raleigh, Thou hast been Indicted, Arraigned, and pleaded not Guilty, for all these several Treasons, and for Trial thereof, hast put thy self upon thy Country; which Country are these, who have found thee Guilty. What canst thou say for thy self, why Judgment and Execution of Death, should not pass against thee?

Raleigh. My Lords, the Jury have found me Guilty. They must do as they are directed. I can say nothing why Judgment should not proceed. You see whereof Cobham hath Accused me. You remember his Protestations, that I was never Guilty. I desire the King should know of the wrongs done unto me, since I came hither.

Lord Chief Justice. You have had no wrong, Sir Walter.

Raleigh. Yes, of Mr. Attorney. I desire my Lords, to remember three things to the King. 1. I was Accused to be a Practiser for Spain: I never knew that my Lord Cobham meant to go thither, I will ask no Mercy at the Kings Hands, if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the Practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my Lord Cobham's Practice with Aremberg, nor of the Surprising Treason.

Lord Chief Justice. In my Conscience I am perswaded, that Cobham hath Accused you truly. You cannot deny, but that you were dealt with, to have a Pension to be a Spie for Spain; therefore you are not so true to the King, as you have protested your self to be.

Raleigh. I submit my self to the King's Mercy, I know his Mercy is greater than my Offence. I recommend my Wife and Son, of tender Years, unbrought up, to his Compassion.

Lord Chief Justice. I had thought I should never have seen this Day, to have stood in this place against you; because I thought it impossible, that one of so great Parts, should have fallen so grievously. God hath bestowed on you many Benefits. You had been a Man fit, and able to have served the King in good Place. You had brought your self into good State of Living, if you had entered into a good Consideration of your Estate, and not suffered your own Wit to have Intrapped your self, you might have lived in good Comfort. It is best for Man not to seek to Climb too high, lest he fall; nor yet to Creep too low, lest he be Treaden on. It was the Poise of the Wisest and greatest Councillor, of his Time in England, In medio spatium mediocritas firma locatur. You might have Lived well with 3000 Pound a Year, for so I have heard your Revenues to be. I know nothing might move you to be discontented; but if you had been Down, you know Fortunes Wheel, when it is turned about, riseth again. I never heard that the King took away any thing from you, but the Captainship of the Guard, which he did with good Reasons, to have one of his own Knowledge, whom he might Trust in that Place. You have been taken for a Wife Man, and so have shewed Wit enough this Day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. If the King had said, it is a Matter that offends my People, should I burthen them for your particular good? I think you could not well take it hardly, that his Subjects were eased, though by your private hindrance. Two Vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager Ambition, the other Corrupt Covetousness.

Ambition, in desiring to be advanced to equal Grace and Favour, as you have been before-time; that Grace you had then, you got not in a Day or Year. For your Covetousness, I am sorry to hear that a Gentleman of your Wealth, should become a base Spie for the Enemy, which is the Vilest of all other; wherein, on my Conscience, Cobham hath said true: by it you would have increased your Living 1500 Pound a Year. This Covetousness is like a Canker, that eats the Iron place where it Lives. Your Case being thus, let it not grieve you, if I speak a little out of Zeal, and Love, to your good. You have been Taxed by the World, with the Defence of most Heathenish, and Blasphemous Opinions, which I list not to Repeat, because Christian Ears cannot endure to hear them, nor the Authors and Maintainers of them suffered to Live in any Christian Commonwealth. You know what Men said of Harpoole. You shall do well before you go out of the World, to give Satisfaction therein, and not to Die with these Imputations on you. Let not any Devil perswade you to think, there is no Eternity in Heaven; for if you think thus, you shall find Eternity in Hell-Fire. In the first Accusation of my Lord Cobham, I observed his manner of speaking; I protested before the Living God, I am perswaded he spoke nothing but the truth. You wrote, that he should not in any case Confess any thing to a Preacher, telling him an Example of my Lord of Essex, that noble Earl that is gone; who if he had not been carried away with others, had Lived in Honour to this Day among us. He confessed his Offences, and obtained Mercy of the Lord, for I am verily perswaded in my Heart, he did a worthy Servant of God. Your conceit of not confessing any thing is very inhumane and Wicked. This is the time of Confessing, that we may be Absolved at the Day of

The Arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh.

The Judgment.

of Judgment. You have shewed a fearful sign of denying God, in advising a Man not to confess. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuser Face to Face, for such a one is easily brought to Retract, when he seeth there is no hope of his own Life. It is dangerous that any Traitors should have any Access one to another, or Conference; when they see themselves must Die, they will think it best to have their Fellow Live, that he may commit the like Treason again, and so in some sort seek Revenge.

Now it resteth to Pronounce the Judgment, which I wish you had not been this Day to have received: For if the Fear of God in you, had been answerable to your other Parts, you might have Lived to have been a singular Subject. I never saw the like Trial, and I hope, I shall never see the like again.

But since you have been found Guilty of these Horrible Treasons, you shall be had from hence to the Place whence you came, there to remain until the Day of Execution; and from thence you shall be Drawn upon a Hurdle through the Streets, to the Place of Execution, there to be Hanged and Cut down alive, and your Body shall be opened, your Heart and Bowels plucked out, and your Privy Members cut off and thrown into the Fire, before your Eyes; then your Head to be stricken off from your Body, which shall be divided into four Quarters, to be disposed at the Kings Pleasure: And God have Mercy upon your Soul.

Here follows the Continuation of the Life.

It was observed that before the Lords (principally to my Lord Cecil) at Winchester (for there he was tryed, the Sicknel then reigning at London) he was humble, but not prostrate; dutiful, but not deject: For in some cases he would humbly thank them for gracious Speeches; in other acknowledge that their Honours said true, as in relating some circumstances. And in such points wherein he would not yield unto them, he would crave pardon, and with reverence urge them, and answer them as in points of Law, or essential matters of Fact. To the Jury he was affable, but not fawning; hoping, but not trusting in them; carefully perswading them with Reason, not desperately importuning them with Conjurations; rather shewing love of Life, than fear of Death. What made ill for Sir Walter, was his discovery of Laurency and Cobham's frequent private Conferences; which so incens'd Cobham that he positively accused him, though the single Evidence of one already convicted of what Sir Walter was but yet impeach'd, could only make a Circumstance, and not convict him. The Judges and the King's Council did what they could to bawl him out of his Life, and since they wanted Proof, they would endeavour to tire him out. If we may believe Osborn, several of the Jury-men, after he was cast, were so far touch'd in conscience as to ask of him pardon on their knees.

A further Confirmation of his Innocency may be a passage of his own in a Letter to Secretary Winwood, wherein he tells him, "That the worthy Prince of Wales was extrem curious in searching out the nature of his Offences. The Queens Majesty had inform'd her self from the beginning. The King of Denmark at both times of his being here, was thoroughly fatished of his Innocency; they would otherwise never have moved his Majesty on his behalf. The Wife, the Brother, and the Son of a King do not sue to sue for Men suspect. Nay, further yet, the Scots themselves declar'd in favour of him, if we may believe him in another Letter of his to Sir Robert Carr, after Earl of Somerset, wherein are these words, "I have ever been bound to your Nation, as well for many other graces, as for the true report of my Tryal to the King's Majesty, against whom had I been malignant the hearing of my Cause could not have changed Enemies into Friends, Malice into Compassion, and the minds of the greatest number then present, into the Commiseration of mine Estate: It is not the nature of foul Treason to beget such fair Passions; neither could it agree with the duty and love of faithful Subjects (especially of your Nation) to bewail his overthrow that had conspired against their most natural and liberal Lord.

Two days after Raleigh's Tryal, were sentenced Brook, who pretended his intention was only to try faithful Subjects, and said he had a Commission for so doing, but produc'd it not. Markham, who confess the Indictment, pleaded Discontent, and desired Mercy. Watson, who confess he drew them all in, holding the King to be no Sovereign till he were crown'd, insinuating in Saul, and Jeroboam; And Clark, who said the like. Parham and Brooksby were acquitted by the Jury; Watson, Clark and Brook were executed; Markham, Cobham, and Grey brought severally on the Scaffold to dye, and at the instant on the Block, had their particular Executions remitted, by a Letter to the Sheriff under the King's own Hand, without the knowledge of any, save Mr. Gibbs, Gentleman of the Bedchamber, that brought it. However, an evil fate did attend these Men; Grey died in the Tower, the last of his Line; the rest were discharg'd, but died miserably poor: Markham and some others abroad.

abroad; but Cobham (as Osborn tells us) in a Room ascended by a Ladder, at a poor Womans house in the Minories (formerly his Landrels) died rather of hunger than a natural disease.

Sir Walter was left to his Majesties Mercy, who thought him too great a Male-content to have his Freedom, and probably too innocent to lose his Life. Therefore in the Tower he is confin'd, but permitted to enjoy Liberty Custodia; where he improv'd his Imprisonment to the greatest advantage of Learning and Inquisitive Men. Since his Majesty had civilly buried him, and as it were banish'd him this World, he thought it no Treason to disturb the Ashes of former times, and bring to view the Actions of decess'd Heroes. And certainly none was so fit to comment on their Achievements, and so able to raise excellent Maxims from them, as he who had been brought up in so wise a Court as Queen Elizabeths, and read so many wise Men. After some time past there, he was delivered of that great Minerva the History of the World, a Book which for the exactness of its Chronology, curiouness of its Contexture and Learning of all sorts, seems to be the Work of an Age. An History which never yet met with a Detractor, and was the Envy, if some Authors are to be credited, of King James himself, who thought none could out-do him at the Pen. That a Man who had been the greatest part of his life taken up in Action, should write so judiciously, so critically of Times and Actions, is as great a Wonder as the Book it self. It still remains a dispute whether the Age he lived in was more obliged to his Pen or his Sword, the one being busy in conquering the New, the other in so bravely describing the Old World. An History wherein the only fault, or defect rather, is, that it wanteth one half thereof; Which was occasioned, as our Story tells us, thus: Some few days before he suffered he sent for Mr. Walter Bury, who formerly printed his first Volumn of the History of the World, whom taking by the Hand, after some other discourse, he ask'd how it had sold? Mr. Bury returned this Answer, It sold so slowly that it had undone him. At which words of his Sir Walter stepping to his Desk, reaches his other unprinted part of his History, which he had brought down to the Times he lived in, and clapping his hand upon his breast, said with a sigh, Oh my Friend, hath the first Part undone thee? the second Part shall undo no more; this ungratefull World is unworthy of it: and immediately going to the Fire-side threw it in, and set his foot on it till it was consumed. As great a loss to Learning as Christendom could have sustained; the greater, because it could be repaired by no hand but his. It often happening to Authors, as to great Masters in Painting, their Pieces are not valued till they are dead, and the succeeding Age find the Originals inimitable.

Whilst Sir Walter was thus confined, Death took away his and Effex's mortal Enemy Sir Robert Cecil, after Earl of Salisbury, who had purchased the monopoly of Favour, and being jealous of Sir Walter's Parts, had some fear he might supplant him; which was the cause, according to Osborn, that he was brought to the aforementioned Tryal. However Sir Walter outlived his Enemies designs and hatred, and for all his kindnesses, bestowed upon him the following Epitaph, which I am upon very good grounds assur'd to be his. King James was so much taken with the smartness of it, that he hoped the Author would die before him. The Verses are these.

K

Here

Here lies Hobinal, our Pastor while ere,
That once in a quarter our fleeces did shear.
To please us, his Cur he kept under clogg,
And was ever after both Shepherd and Dog.
For oblation to Pan his custom was thus,
He first gave a trifle, then offer'd up us.
And through his false Worship such pow'r he did gain,
As kept him 'oth Mountain, and us on the Plain:
Where many a Hornpipe he tui'd to his Phillis,
And sweetly sung Walsingham to's Amarillis,
Till Actæos clapt him, a Pox on the Drab,
For flight of his Tarbox he dy'd of the Scab.

If the Reader desires a Key to these Verses, he may meet with it in Osborn's Memoirs, who yet for all his Intelligence hath not informed us that his Mistress's name was Walsingham.

Fourteen Years Sir Walter had spent in the Tower, and being weary of a state wherein he could be only serviceable by his Pen, but not in a capacity of serving and enriching his Country any other way, (Of whom Prince Henry would say, that no King but his Father would keep such a Bird in a Cage;) At length he fell upon an Enterprize of a Golden Mine in Guiana in the Southern parts of America. The Proposition of this was presented and recommended to his Majesty by Sir Ralph Winwood the Secretary of State, as a matter not in the Air, or Speculative, but Real and of certainty, for that Sir Walter had seen of the Ore of the Mine, and tried the richness of it, having gotten a pound from thence by the hands of Captain Kemish his ancient Servant.

Sir Ralph Winwood's Recommendations of the Design, and the earnest Solicitations for his Enlargement of the Queen, the Prince, and the French Leiger, (with much affection to his Deserts, not without some Politick Designs on Spain) together with the Asseverations of Sir Walter of the Truth of the Mine, work'd upon his Majesty, who thought himself in Honour obliged, nay in a manner engaged (as the Declaration which he published after the Death of Sir Walter tells us) not to deny unto his People the Adventure and Hope of so great Riches, to be fought and achieved at the Charge of Volunteers, especially since it stood so well with his Majesties Politick and Magnanimous Courses in these his flourishing Times of Peace, to nourish and encourage Noble and Generous Enterprizes for Plantations, Discoveries, and opening of a new Trade.

Count Gondamor (an active and subtle Instrument to serve his Master's ends) took Allarm at this, and represented to his Majesty the Enterprize of Sir Walter to be hostile, and predatory, intending to a breach of the Peace between the two Crowns. But notwithstanding, Power at last is granted to Sir Walter to set forth Ships and Men for that Service. However, the King commanded him upon pain of his Allegiance to give him under his Hand (promising on the Word of a King to keep it secret) the number of his Men, the burthen and strength of his Ships, together with the Country and River which he was to enter; which being done accordingly by Sir Walter, that very Original Paper was found in the Spanish Governours Closet at St. Thomas. So active were the Spanish Ministers, that Advertisement was sent to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before the English Fleet got out of the Thames.

But

But as we have just cause to admire the more than usual Activity of the Spanish Agents, so may we wonder no less at the Mis carriage of his Majesties present Ministers, who notwithstanding he had past his Royal Word to the contrary, yet they did help Count Gondamor to that very Paper; So much both King and Court were at Gondamor's service.

A Commission indeed is granted, but by Gondamor's means is limited; that the Fleet should commit no Outrages upon the King of Spain's Subjects by Land, unless they began first, with other limitations in the Commission, which for the Readers Curiosity and Satisfaction I have here inserted.

JAMES by the Grace of G O D, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come, to be read, heard, or seen, and to every of them greeting. Whereas Sir Walter Raleigh Knight, intendeth to undertake a Voyage by Sea and Shipping, unto the South parts of America, or elsewhere Within America, possessed and inhabited by Heathen and Savage People, to the end, to discover and find out some Commodities and Merchandizes in those Countries, that be necessary and profitable for the Subjects of these Our Kingdoms and Dominions, whereof the Inhabitants there make little or no use or estimation; whereupon also may ensue by Trade and Commerce, some propagation of the Christian Faith, and reformed Religion amongst those Savage and Idolatrous People: And whereas We are credibly informed, that there are divers Merchants and Owners of Ships, and others, well disposed to assist the said Sir Walt. Raleigh in this his Enterprize, had they sufficient assurance to enjoy their due parts of the Profits returned (in respect of the Peril of Law wherein the said Sir Walter Raleigh now standeth:) And whereas also We are informed, that divers other Gentlemen, the Business and Friends of the said Sir Walt. Raleigh, and divers Captains and other Commanders, are also desirous to follow him, and to adventure their Lives with him, in this his Journey, so as they might be commanded by no other than himself.

Know ye, that We, upon deliberate Consideration had of the Premises, being desirous by all ways and means to work and procure the benefit and good of Our loving Subjects, and to give our Princely furtherance to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, his Friends and Associates herein, to the Encouragement of others in the like laudable Journeys and Enterprizes, to be hereafter prosecuted and pursued; and especially in advancement and furtherance, alwel of the Conversion of Savage People, as of the increase of the Trade, Traffique, and Merchandizes used by Our Subjects of this Our Kingdom, being most famous throughout all Nations: Of Our special Grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, have given and granted, and by these Presents for Us, Our Heirs, and Successours, do give and grant unto the said Sir Walt. Raleigh, full power and Authority, and free License and Liberty out of this Our Realm of England, or any other Our Dominions, to have, carry, take, and lead, for and towards his said intended Voyage into the said South parts, or other parts of America, (possessed and inhabited, as aforesaid) and to Travel thither, all such, and so many of Our loving Subjects, or any other Strangers that will become Our loving Subjects, and live under Our Obedience and Allegiance, as shall willingly accompany him, with sufficient Shipping, Armour, Weapons, Ordnance, Munition, Powder, Shot, habiliments, Victuals, and such Wares and Merchandizes, as are esteemed by the wild People in those parts, Clothing, Implements, Furniture, Cattel, Horses and Hares, and all other such things as he shall think most necessary for his Voyage, and for the use and defence of him and his Company, and Trade with the People there; and in passing and returning to and fro, and in those parts to give away, Sell, Barter, Exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same Goods, Merchandizes, and Premises, to the most benefit, and at the will and pleasure of the said Sir Walter Raleigh and his Company, and such other Person or Persons, as shall be Adventurers or Assistants with, or unto him in this his intended Voyage, and from thence to Return, Import, Convey, and bring into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, such Gold, Silver, Bullion, or any other Wares, or Merchandizes, or Commodities whatsoever, as they shall think most fit and convenient; and the same being so Returned, Imported, Conveyed, and brought into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, to have, take, keep, retain, and convert to the only proper Use, Benefit, and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and other Persons Adventurers and Assistants with, or to him in his Voyage, without the Let, Interruption, Distraction, and Disturbance of Us, Our heirs or Successors, or any the Officers, or Ministers of Us, Our heirs, or Successors, the full fifth part in five parts to be divided, of all such Gold, and Silver, and Bullion, and Ore of Gold, or Silver, and Pearl, and precious Stone, as shall be Imported over and besides, and together with such Customs, Subsidies, and other Duties, as shall be due for, or in respect of any other Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoever to be so Imported by the true meaning of these Presents. And to the end the said Sir Walter Raleigh may be the more Encouraged to go forward in this his Enterprise, and all Our loving Subjects desirous to be Adventurers with him, or Assistant unto him, may be the more incited to further his Proceedings: We do hereby in verbo Regio, for Us, Our heirs, and Successors, Covenant, Promise, and Grant, to and with the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all other Persons that shall accompany him, or to be attendant upon him, or to be Adventurers or Assistants with, or to him in this his Voyage, that no Gold, Silver, Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes what-

for-

soever, of what kind or sort soever, by him or them, or any of them to be Imported into this Our Kingdom of England, or any other Our Dominions, from any the said South, or other parts of America (possessed or Inhabited, as aforesaid) shall be attached, seized, or taken by Us, Our heirs, or Successors, or to the use of Us, Our heirs, or Successors, or by any the Officers or Ministers of Us, Our heirs, or Successors whatsoever; But that the same, and every of them (the fifth part of the said Gold, Silver, or Bullion, and Ore of Gold and Silver, and Pearl and precious Stones, and other the Customs and Duties aforesaid, being truly answered and payed) shall be, and remain to the sole and proper use and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and such Persons as shall be Adventurers with him, or Assistant to him in this his Voyage; any Law, Statute, Act of Parliament, Proclamation, Provision, or Restraint, or any Right, Title, or Claim of Us, Our heirs or Successors, or any other matter or thing whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And further, of Our more especial Grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, We do hereby for Us, Our heirs, and Successors, ordain, constitute and appoint the said Sir Walter Raleigh to be the sole Governor and Commander of all Persons that shall Travel, or be with him in the said Voyage, to the said South, or other parts of America (so possessed and Inhabited as aforesaid) or in returning from thence. And We do hereby give unto him, full Power and Authority to Correct, Punish, pardon, Govern, and Rule them, or any of them, according to such Orders, Ordinances, Constitutions, Directions, and Instructions, as by the said Sir Walter Raleigh shall be from time to time Established, aswell in cases Capital and Criminal, as Civil, both Marine and other; So always as the said Statutes, Ordinances and Proceedings (as near as conveniently may be) be agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Government and Policy of this Our Realm of England, and not against the true Christian Faith now professed in the Church of England. And because that in such and the like Enterprises and Voyages, great Inconveniences have grown by the mutinous and disorderly carriage of the Mariners and Sailors employed in the same, for want of sufficient Authority to Punish them according to their Offences: We do therefore by these Presents for Us, our heirs and Successors, give full Power and Authority to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, in case of Rebellion, or Mutiny by Sea or Land, to use and exercise Partial Law (upon just ground and apparent necessity) in as large and ample manner as our Lieutenant General by Sea or Land, or our Lieutenants in our Counties, within Our Realm of England, have, had, or ought to have by force of their Commission of Lieutenantcy. And we do further by these Presents, give full Power and Authority to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, to Collect, Promote and Appoint, such Captains and other inferior Commanders and Ministers under him, as shall be requisite for the better ordering and governing of his Company, and the good of the Voyage. And further, We do by these Presents, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, straightly Charge and Command the Warden of Our Cinque-Ports, and all the Customers, Comptrollers, Surveyers, Searchers, Waiters and other Officers and Ministers of Us, Our heirs and Successors for the time being, that they, and every of them do quietly permit and suffer the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all Person and Persons that shall be willing to Travel and Adventure with him in this Voyage with their Ships, Munition, Goods, Wares, and Merchandizes whatsoever out of this Our Realm, or any other Our Dominions, to pass into the said South or other parts of America, (possessed and Inhabited as aforesaid) and from thence to return and import into this Our Realm, or any other our Dominions, any Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoever, and there to sell, or otherwise to dispose of the same, to the best benefit and advantage, and to the only use and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh and his Company, and such other Persons as shall be Adventurers with him in this Voyage, paying the fifth part of all Gold and Silver, Ballion, and War of Gold and Silver, and of Pearl and Precious Stone imported, and other the Customs and Duties aforesaid. And these Presents, or the Inrolment thereof shall be unto the said Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Customers, Comptrollers, and other the Officers and Ministers aforesaid, for the time being, a sufficient Warrant and Discharge in that behalf. And Our Will and Pleasure is; And by these Presents, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, We do grant unto the said Sir Walter Raleigh, That these our Letters Patents, or the Inrolment thereof, and all and singular Grants, Clauses, and things therein contained, shall be firm, strong, sufficient, and effectual in Law, according to Our gracious Pleasure and Meaning herein expressed; Any Law, Statute, Act, Provision, Ordinance, or Restraint, or any other Matter or Thing to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding. Although express mention, &c. In Witnesses Whereof, &c. Witness Our Self at Westminster, the six and twentieth Day of August, in the fourteenth Year of Our Reign of England, France and Ireland, and of Scotland the sixtieth.

Per breve de privato Sigillo.

With

With this Commission, and the Company of several brave Captains, and other Knights and Gentlemen of great Blood, and Worth, he set out in Quest of the Mine, with a compleat Fleet of Twelve Sail. Letting fall a Speech at his Departure, which was rather an Argument of his Wit, than his Wildom, That his whole History of the World, had not the like President: Of a Kings Prisoner to purchase Freedom, and his bosome Favourite to have the Halter; but in Scripture, Mordecai and Haman: Meaning himself and the Duke of Sommerfet. To which he was told, that the King replied, He might Die in that deceit; which he did, for Sommerfet was saved. Of whom was made good, what Sir Walter used to say of Favourites; That Minions were not so happy as Vulgar Judgments thought them, being frequently Commanded to uncomely, and sometimes to unnatural Employments.

On the 17th of November, he Arrived at Guiana, having been much Retarded by contrary Winds, and having lost several of his Volunteers in the Voyage, by a violent Calenture. But of the whole Transactions, Sir Walter hath given us an exact Account, in his Letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary; which I have here Transcribed.

SIR,

AS I have not hitherto given you any Account of our Proceedings and Passages towards the Indies, so have I no other Subject to Write of, than of the greatest Misfortunes that ever befel any Man. For whereas for the first, all those that Navigate between Cape de Verd, and America, do pass between Fifteen or Twenty Days at most, we found the Wind so contrary, and (which are also contrary to Nature) so many Storms and Rains, as we spent six Weeks in the Passage; by reason whereof, and that in so great Heat, we wanted Water. For at the Isle Prano of Cape de Vred, we Lost our Anchors and Cables, and our Water-Casks; and being driven from the Isle with a Hurricane, we were like all to have Perished. Great sickness fell amongst us, and carried away great Numbers of our ablest Men, both for Sea and Land. The 17th of November, we had sight of Guiana, and soon after came to Anchor in five Degrees of the River Galliano; here we stay'd till the 4th of December, landed our Sick-men, set up our Barges and Shalops, which were brought out of England in Quarters, washed our Ships, and took in Fresh-water, being Fed and Cherished by the Indians of my old Acquaintance, with a great deal of Love and Respect. My self being in the hands of Death this six Weeks, and not able otherwise to move, then as I was carried in a Chair, gave order to five small Ships to sail into Orinoco, having Captain Kernith for their Conduktor towards the Mines: And in those five Ships, five Companies of fifty, under the Command of Captain Parker, Capt. North, Brethren to the Lord Montague, and the Lord North, valiant Gentlemen, and of infinite Patience, for the Labour, Hunger, and Heat, which they have endured: My Son had the third Company, Capt. Thornix of Kent, the fourth Company, Capt. Chidley, by his Lieutenant, the fifth. But as my Sergeant Major, Captain Piggot, died in the former miserable Passage, so my Lieutenant, Sir Warham Saint Leiger, lay sick without hope of Life, and the Charge conferred on my Nephew, George Raleigh, who had also served long with infinite Commendations; but by reason of my absence, and of Sir Warhams, was not so well Obeyed as the Enterprize required. As they passed up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and shot at us, both with their Ordinance and Muskets; whereupon the Companies were forced to Charge them, and soon after Beat them out of the Town. In the Assault, my Son (more desirous of Honour than safety) was slain; with whom, to say truth, all the respects of this World have taken end in me; and although these five Captains had as weak Companies as ever followed valiant Leaders, yet were there amongst them some Twenty or Thirty valiant Adventurous Gentlemen, and of singular Courage; as of my Sons Company, Mr. Knivet, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Langworth, Mr. John Pleasington; his Officers, Sir John Hamblen, Mr. Simon Leak, Corporal of the Field, Mr. Hammond, the Elder Brother, Mr. Nicholas of Buckingham, Mr. Roberts of Kent, Mr. Perin, Mr. Tresham, Mr. Mullinax, Mr. Winter and his Brother, Mr. Wray, Mr. Miles Herbert, Mr. Bradshaw, Captain Hall, and others.

Sir, I have set down the Names of these Gentlemen, to the end, that if his Majesty shall have cause to use their service, it may please you to take Notice of them for very sufficient Gentlemen. The other five Ships staid at Trinidad, having no other Port capable of them near Guiana. The second Ship was Commanded by my Vice-Admiral Captain John Pennington, of whom (to do him right) he is one of the sufficientest Gentlemen for the Sea, that England hath. The third by Sir Warham Saint Leiger, an exceeding Valiant and Worthy Gentleman. The fourth by Sir John Fern. The fifth by Captain Chidley, of Devon. With these five Ships I daily attended their Armada of Spain, which had they set upon us, our Force divided, the one half in Orinoco 150 miles from us, we had not only been torn in Pieces, but all those in the River had also Perished, being of no Force at all for Sea-fight. But we had resolved to be Burnt by their sides, had the Armada arrived: But belike, they stay'd for us at Margaret, by which they knew we must pass to the Indies. For it pleased his Majesty to value us at so little, as to command me upon my Allegiance, to set down under my hand the Country and River by which I was to enter it; to set down the Number of my Men, and Burthen of my Ships, and what Ordinance every Ship carried; which being known to the Spanish Ambassador, and by him, unto the King of Spain, a dispatch was made, and Letters sent from Madrid, before my departure out of the Thames. For his first Letter sent by a Barque of Advice, was Dated the 19th of March, 1617. at Madrid, which Letter I have here inclosed sent to your Honour; the rest I reserve, not knowing whether they may be Intercepted or not. The second by the King, dated the second of May, sent also by a Colonel of Diego de Polonioque, Governor of Guiana, Elderedo, and Trinidad. The third by the Bishop of Perericho, and delivered to Polonioque, the 15th of July at Trinidad. And the fourth was sent from the Farmer and Secretary of his Customes in the Indies. At the same time by that of the Kings Hand sent by the Bishop, there was also a Commission for the speedy Levying of 300 Souldiers, and ten Pieces of Ordinance, to be sent from Portriche, for the Defence of Guiana. One 150 from Nuevo Remo de Grando, under the Command of Captain Anthony Mufica; and the other 150 from Portricho, to be Conduited by Captain Francis Landio.

Now Sir, if all that have Traded to the Indies since his Majesties time, knew that the Spaniards have Flayed alive all the Poor Men which they have taken, being but Merchant-Men, what Death and cruel Torment shall we expect, if they Conquer us? Certainly, they have hitherto failed grossly, being set out thence as we were, both for Number, Time, and Place.

Lastly, to make an Apologie for not Working the Mine (though I know his Majesty expected it, whom I am to satisfie as much as my self) having lost my Son and my Estate in the Enterprize; yet it is true, that the Spaniards took more care to defend the Passage leading unto it, than they did the Town, which by the Kings Instructions they might easily do, the Countreies being Alpera & Nemorofa.

But

But it is true, that when Captain Kemish found the River low, and that he could not approach the Banks in most places near the Myne by a mile, and where he found a Defcent, a Volley of Muskets came from the Woods upon the Boat, and slew two Rowers, and hurt six others, and shot a valiant Gentleman of Captain Thomix, of which Wound he languisheth to this day. He, to wit, Capt. Kemish, following his own Advice, thought that it was in vain to discover the Myne; for he gave me this for an Excuse at his return, that the Companies of English in the Town of St. Thome, were not able to Defend it against the daily and mighty Assaults of the Spaniards, that the Passages to the Mines were thick and impassable Woods, and that the Myne being Discovered, they had no Men to spork it; did not Discover it at all: For it is true, the Spaniards having two Gold Mines near the Town, the one possessed by Pedro Rodrigo de Parari, the second by Harmian Frotnio, the third of Silver by Captain Francisco, for the want of Negroes to work them; for as the Indians cannot be constrained, by a Law of Charles the 5th, so the Spaniards will not, nor can endure the Labour of those Mines: whatsoever the Bragadocio, the Spanish Ambassador saith. I shall prove under the Proprietors hands, by the Custome Book, and the Kings Quinto, of which I recovered an Ingot or two: I shall also make it appear to my Prince, or State, that will undertake it, how easily those Mines, and and five or six more of them may be Possessed, and the most of them in those Parts, which have never as yet been Attempted by any way by any Passage to them, nor ever Discovered by the English, French, or Dutch. But at Kemish's return from Orinocoque, when I rejected his counsel and his course, and told him that he had undone me, and wounded my Credit with the King past Recovery, he slew himself: For I told him, that seeing my Son was slain, I cared not if I had lost 100 more in opening the Myne, so my Credit had been saved. For I protested before God, had not Capt. Whitney (to whom I gave more countenance, than to all the Captains of my Fleet) run from me at the Granadoes, and carried another Ship with him of Capt. Woolastons: I would have left my Body at St. Thome; by my Sons, or have brought with me out of that or other Mines, so much Gold Oar as should have satisfied the King. I propounded no vain thing; what shall become of me I know not. I am unpardoned in England, and my poor Estate consumed, and whether any Prince will give me Bread or no, I know not. I desire your Honour to hold me in your good Opinion, to remember my Service to my Lord of Arundel and Pembroke, to take some Pity on my poor Wife, to whom I dare not write for renewing her sorrow for her Son; and I beseech you to give a Copy of this to my Lord Carew, for to a broken Mind, a sick Body, and weak Eyes, it is a Torment to write many Letters. I have found many things of Importance for Discovering the State and Weakness of the Indies, which, if I live, I shall hereafter impart unto your Honour, to whom I shall remain a faithful Servant,

WALTER RALEIGH.

Whilst this Action of St. Thome was performed, and the Repulse in the way to the Mine, Sir Walter stay'd at St. Pont de Gallo, the space of nine Weeks, where the unwelcome News was brought him of the Loss of his Son, and the Defeat they met with in their Design upon the Myne. However this ill News could not alter the Resolutions of Sir Walter, of Returning to England, though he knew he should meet with several Enemies there, who had by their Calumnies, rendred the Voyage nothing but a Design; and though several of his Men were for Landing at New-found-Land. For if we may believe himself at the Hour of his Death, the two Noble Earls, Thomas of Arundel, and William of Pembroke, Engaged him to Return; and Sir Walter was resolved, though inevitable Danger threatened him, to keep his Promise.

No

No sooner had they arrived upon the Coasts of Ireland, but the Taking and Sacking of St. Thome, and the Firing of the Town, and putting the Spaniards there to the Sword (though in their own Defence) was Noised abroad in all Parts, and was by special Advertisement, come unto the knowledge of Count de Gondamor. Who thereupon desiring Audience of his Majesty, said he had but one word to say; his Majesty much wondering what might be delivered in one word: When he came before him, he only Bawled out, Pyrates, Pyrates, Pyrates. A very pretty short Speech for an Ambassador. Whereupon his Majesty Published his Royal Proclamation, for the Discovery of the truth of Sir Walt. Raleigh's Proceedings, and the Advancement of Justice. But after all this Noise, Sir Walter is not questioned for his Guiana Action, for it is believed, not without very good Ground, that neither the Transgression of his Commission, nor any thing Acted beyond the Line, where the Articles of Peace between the two Crowns did not extend, could have in a Legal Course of Trial shorned his days.

When Sir Walter was arrived at Plymouth, Sir Lewis Steuckley, Vice-Admiral of the County of Devon, seized him, being Commissioned by his Majesty to bring him for London; which could add no Terror to a Person who could expect nothing less; and was now forced to make use of all the Arts imaginable to appease his Majesty, and defer his Anger. To which intent, Mannowry, a French Quack, at Salisbury gave him several Vomits, and an Artificial Composition, which made him look Gaskly and Dreadful, full of Pimples and Blisters, and put the Cheat upon the very Physicians themselves, who could not tell what to make of his Urine (though often inspected) being Adulterated with a Drug in the Glafs; that turned it even in their very hands, into an earthy Humour of a blackish Colour, and of a very offensive favour.

While he lay under this Politique Disguise, he Penned his Declaration and Apologie, which have sufficiently proved his honourable Designs in that Voyage, and answered the little Calumnies of his Enemies. When he was brought to London, he was permitted the Confinement of his own House, but finding the Court wholly guided by Gondamor, he could hope for little Mercy; therefore he wisely contrived the design of an Escape into France, which Sir Lewis Steuckley betrayed. But the fate of Traytors pursued him, and brought him to a contemptible End, to die a poor distracted Begger in the Isle of Lindley, having for a Bag of Money falsified his faith, confirmed by the Tie of the Holy Sacrament, (if we may give Credit to Mr. Hemel who hath given us this Story;) as also before the Year came about, to be found Clipping the same very Coyn in the Kings own House at White-Hall, which he had received for a Revard of his Perfidiousness: For which, being Condemned to be Hanged, he was forced to sell himself to his Shirt, to purchase his Pardon of two Knights.

King James was willing to Sacrifice the Life of Sir Walter to the Advancement of Peace with Spain, but not upon such Grounds as the Ambassador had design'd; for he desired a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occasion he might slyly gain from the English an acknowledgment of his Matters right in those Places, and hereafter both stop their Mouths, and quench their Heat and Valour. Hence upon his old Condemnation (for having had experience upon a former Trial, they cared not to run the hazard of a second) he was Sentenced: The old Judgment being only Averred against him; and from Westminster-Hall he was carried ried to the Gate-House; and from thence the next Morning to the Parliament-Yard, where he had the favour of the Ax granted him. But all Persons have wondered how that old Sentence, that had lain Dormant sixteen Years and upwards against Sir Walter, could have been made use of to take off his Head afterwards: Considering the then Lord Chancellor Venulam, told him positively, (as Sir Walter was acquainting him with that Proffer of Sir William St. Geor, for a pecuniary Pardon, which might have been obtained for a less Sum, than his Guiana Preparations amounted to) in these words: "Sir, the Knee Timber of your Voyage is Money, spare your Purse in this particular, for upon my Life, you have a sufficient Pardon for all that is passed already, the King having under his Broad Seal made you Admiral of your Fleet, and given you Power of the Martial Law over the Officers and Souldiers. It was the Opinion of most Lawyers, that he, who by his Majesties Patent, had power of Life and Death over the Kings Leige People, should be esteemed or judged Reus in Curia, and free from all old Convictions. But Sir Walter hath made the best Defence for his Guiana Actions, in his Letter to his Majesty, which I have here Inserted.

May it Please your Most Excellent Majesty,

"IF in my Journey Outward bound, I had my Men Murdered at the Island, and yet spared to take Revenge. If I did discharge some Spanish Barques taken, without Spoil. If I did forbear all parts of the Spanish Indies, wherein I might have taken Twenty of their Towns, on the Sea-Coasts, and did only follow the Enterprize I undertook for Guiana, where without any Directions from me, a Spanish Village was Burnt, which was new set up within three miles of the Myne; by your Majesties favour, I find no Reason why the Spanish Ambassador should complain of me. If it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder 26 Englishmen, binding them back to back, and then cutting their Throats, when they had Traded with them a whole Month, and came to them on the Land without so much as one Sword; and that it may not be lawful for your Majesties Subjects, being Charged first by them, to repel Force by Force; we may justly say, O miserable English! If Parker and Metham took Campeach and other Places in the Honduraes, seated in the heart of the Spanish Indies, burnt Towns, killed the Spaniards, and had nothing said to them at their Return, and my self forbore to look into the Indies because I would not Offend; I may justly say, O miserable Sir Walter Raleigh! If I spent my poor Estate, lost my Son, suffered by Sicknes, and otherwise a world of Miseries; if I have Resisted with the manifest hazard of my Life, the Robberies and Spoils which my Company would have made; if when I was Poor, I might have made my self Rich; if when I had gotten my Liberty, which all Men, and Nature it self do so much prize, I voluntarily lost it; if when I was sure of my Life, I rendred it again; if I might elsewhere have sold my Ship and Goods, and put 5 or 6000 Pound in my Pocket, and yet brought her into England. I beseech your Majesty to believe, that all this I have done, because it should not be said to your Majesty, that your Majesty had given Liberty and Trust, to a man whose End was but the Recovery of his Liberty, and who had betrayed your Majesties Trust. My Mutineers told me, that if I returned for England, I should be undone; but I believed in your Majesties Goodness more than in all their Arguments.

"Sure

"Sure, I am, that I am the first that being Free and able to Enrich my self, have imbraced Poverty and Peril. And as sure I am, that my Example shall make me the last. But your Majesties Wildom and Goodness I have made my Judges, who have ever been, and shall ever be, your Majesties

Most Humble Vassal,

WALTER RALEIGH.

But this Apology, though never so perswasive, could not satisfie Gondomar's Rage, who was resolv'd to Sacrifice the only Favorite left of Queen Elizabeth, to the Spanish Interest: and who, as Osborn remarks, was the only Person of Essex's Enemies that died lamented, and the only Man left of Note alive, that had helped to Beat the Spaniard in the Year 1588.

Upon Thursday the 29th of October, 1618. Sir Walter Raleigh was Conveyed by the Sheriffs of London, to a Scaffold in the Old Pallace at Westminster, where he was Executed about Nine of the Clock in the Morning of the same Day: Whose Confession and several Speeches there delivered, with his Gesture and Behaviour, were as follows.

His first appearance upon the Scaffold, was with a smiling Countenance, saluting the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen, with others of his Acquaintance there present; when after a Proclamation of Silence by an Officer appointed, he addrest himself to Speak in this manner.

I desire to be born withal, because this is the third day of my Feaver: And if I shew any weaknes, I beseech you to attribute it to my Malady for this is the Hour I look for it.

Then pawling a while, directing himself towards a Window, where the Lord of Arundel, and the Lord of Doncaster, with some other Lords and Knights sat, with a loud Voice he said as followeth.

"I thank God of his Infinite Goodness, that he hath sent me to Die in the sight of so Honourable an Assembly, and not in Darknes. But by reason the place where they sat, was some distance from the Scaffold, that they could not easily hear him, he said: I will strain my self, for I would willingly have your Honours hear me. The Lord of Arundel answered, We will come upon the Scaffold; where after he had saluted every one of them severally, he began as followeth.

"As I said, I thank my God heartily, that he hath brought me into the Light to Die, and hath not suffered me to Die in the dark Prison of the Tower, where I have suffered a great deal of Adversity, and a long Sickness; and I thank God that my Feaver hath not taken me at this time, as I pray'd God it might not.

"There are two main Points of Suspition, that his Majesty hath conceived against me, and wherein his Majesty cannot be satisfied, which I desire to Clear and Resolve you off:

"One is that his Majesty hath been informed that I have had some Plot with France, and his Majesty had some Reason to induce him thereunto. One Reason that his Majesty had to Conjecture so, was, that when I came back from Guiana being come to Plymouth, I endeavoured to go to Rochel, which was because I would fain have made my Peace before I came to England. Another Reason was that upon my Flight, I did intend to Flie to France for saving of my Life, having had some Terror from above. A third Reason was the French Agent's coming to me, and it was Reported that I had Commission from the King of France.

But

"But this I say, for a Man to call God to Witnes to a Falfhood at any time is a grievous sin, and what shall he hope for at the Tribunal Day of Judgment? But to call God to Witnes to a Falfhood at the time of Death, is far more grievous and impious, and there is no hope for such an one. And what should I expect that am now going to render an Account of my Faith? I do therefore call the Lord to Witnes, as I hope to be saved, and as I hope to see Him in his Kingdom, which I hope will be within this quarter of this Hour; I never had any Commission from the King of France, nor any Treaty with the French Agent, nor with any from the French King; neither knew I that there was an Agent, or what he was, till I met him in my Gallery at my Lodging unlooked for. If I speak not true, O Lord, let me never come into thy Kingdom.

"The second Suspition was, that his Majesty hath been Informed, that I should speak Dishonourably and Disloyally of him. But my Accuser was a bafe Frenchman, a kind of a Chymical Fellow, one whom I knew to be Perfidious; for being drawn into this Action at Winchester in which my Hand was toucht, and he being sworn to secrecy over Night, revealed it in the Morning.

"But in this I speak now, What have I to do with Kings? I have nothing to do with them, neither do I fear them: I have now to do with God, therefore to tell a Lye now to get the Favour of the King, were in vain. Therefore, as I hope to be saved at the last Day, I never spake Dishonourably, Disloyally, or Dishonestly of the King; neither to this Frenchman, nor to any other; neither had I ever in all my Life, a thought of ill of his Majesty. Therefore I cannot but think it strange, that this Frenchman being so bafe, so mean a Fellow, should be so far Credited; and so much for this Point. I have dealt truly, and I hope I shall be believed. I confess, I did attempt to escape, and I did dissemble and fain my self Sick at Salisbury, but I hope it was no sin. The Prophet David did make himself a Fool, and did suffer Spittle to fall upon his Beard to escape the hands of his Enemies, and it was not imputed to him as sin; and I did it to prolong Time till his Majesty came, hoping for some Commiseration from him.

"I forgive this Frenchman, and Sir Lewis Steuckley, and have received the Sacrament this Morning of Mr. Dean, and I do also forgive all the World. But thus much I am bound in Charity to speak of this Man, that all Men may take good heed of him: Sir Lewis Steuckley, my Kinsman and Keeper, hath affirmed, that I should tell him, that I did tell my Lord Carew, and my Lord Doncaster, of my present Escape; but I protest before God, I never told Steuckley any such thing, neither did I tell my Lord Carew, or my Lord Doncaster of my pretended Escape. It was not likely that I should acquaint two Privy Councillors of my purpose; neither would I tell him, for he left me 6, 7, 8, 9, or 10 Days to go where I listed, while he Rode about the Country.

"Again he Accused me, that I should tell him, that my Lord Carew, and my Lord Doncaster, would meet me in France, which was never my Speech or Thought.

"Thirdly, He Accused me, that I shew'd him a Letter, and that I should give him 10000 Pound for my Escape; but cast my Soul into everlasting Fire, if I ever made him offer of 10000 Pounds, or 1000 Pounds, but merely I shew'd him a Letter, that if he would go with me, his Debts should be paid when he was gone; neither had I 1000 Pound, for if I had had so much, I could have done better with it, and made my Peace otherwise.

N

Fourthly,

'Fourthly, When I came to Sir Edward Pelham, who had been sometimes a follower of mine, who gave me good Entertainment, he gave out that I had received some Dram of Poylon in Sir Edward Pelham's House; when I answered, that I feared no such thing, for I was well assured of them in the House. Now God forgive him, for I do, and I desire God to forgive him; I will not only say God is the God of Revenge, but I desire God to forgive him, as I hope to be forgiven.

Then he looked over his Note of Remembrance, 'Well, faith he, thus far have I gone, now a little more, and I will have done by and by.

'It was told the King I was brought per force into England, and that I did not intend to come again, whereas Captain Charles Parker, Mr. Tresham, Mr. Leak, and divers others, that knew how I was dealt withal, shall Witness for me; for the Common Souldiers, which were 150 Mutined, and sent for me to come into the Gun-Room to them, for at that time they would not come to me; and there was I forced to take an Oath, that I would not come into England till they would have me, or else they would cast me into the Sea and Drown me; afterwards they entred my Cabbin and set themselves against me. After I had taken this Oath, with Wine and other things I drew the chiefeft of them to desist, and at length I perswaded them to go into Ireland; then would they have gone into the North parts of Ireland, but I told them they were Redbanks: But at last with much ado I perswaded them to go into the South parts; promising to get their Pardons, but was forced to give them 12 5 Pound at Kinsale to bring them Home, otherwise I had never got from them.

'There was a Report that I meant not to go to Guiana at all, and that I knew not of any Myne, nor intended any such matter, but only to get my Liberty, which I had not the Wit to keep. But it was my full intent to go for Gold, for the Benefit of his Majesty and those that went with me, with the rest of my Country-Men: But he that knew the Head of the Myne would not Discover it, when he saw that my Son was slain, but made himself away. And then he turned to my Lord of Arundel, and said, Being in the Gallery in my Ship at my Departure, your Honour took me by the Hand, and said you would request me one thing, that was, That whether I made a good Voyage or bad, yet I should return again into England; when I made you a Promise and gave you my Faith that I would: And so you did (answered my Lord) it is true, they were the last words I spake into you. Another Opinion was, that I carried to Sea with me 1600 Pieces, and that was all the Voyage I intended, only to get Money into my hands, and that I had weighed my Voyage before; whereas I protest I had but a 100 Pound in all the World; whereof I gave 25 Pounds to my Wife: the reason of this Speech was this; there was entered 20000 Pound, and yet but 4000 Pound in the Surveyors Book, now I gave my Bill for the other 16000 Pound for divers Adventurers, but I protest I had not a Penny of Money more than 100 Pound, as I hope to be faved.

'Another Slander was raised, that I would have gone away from them and left them at Guiana, but there were a great many of worthy Men that Accompanied me always, as my Serjeant Major George Raleigh, and divers others (which he then named) that knew my intent was nothing so. And these be the Material Points I thought good to speak of; I am now at this instant to render my Account to God, and I protest as I shall appear before Him, this that I have spoken is true.

I

'I will speak but a word or two more, because I will not trouble Mr. Sheriff too long.

'There was a Report spread, that I should rejoyce at the death of my Lord of Essex, and that I should take Tobacco in his presence; when as I protest I shed Tears at his Death, though I was one of the contrary Faction; and at the time of his Death I was all the while in the Armory at the further end, where I could but see him; I was sorry that I was not with him, for I heard he had a desire to see me, and be Reconciled to me. So that I protest I lamented his Death, and good cause had I, for it was the worse for me as it proved, for after he was gone I was little beloved.

'And now I intreat you all to joyn with me in Prayer, that the Great God of Heaven, whom I have grievously offended, being a Man full of all Vanity, and have lived a sinful Life, in all sinful Callings, having been a Souldier, a Captain, a Sea-Captain, and a Courtier, which are all places of Wickedness and Vice; that God (I say) would forgive me, and cast away my Sins from me, and that he would receive me into everlasting Life. So I take my leave of you all, making my Peace with God.

Then Proclamation being made that all Men should depart the Scaffold, he prepared himself for Death, giving away his Hat and wrought Night-cap, and some Money to such as he knew that stood near him: Taking his leave of the Lords, Knights, and other Gentlemen, and among the rest taking his leave of the Lord of Arundel, he thanked him for his Company, and intreated him to desire the King, that no Scandalous Writing to Defame him might be Published after his Death; saying further unto him, I have a long Journey to go, and therefore will take my leave.

Then putting off his Gown and Doublet, he called to the Headman to shew him the Ax, which being not presently shew'd him, he said, I pray thee let me see it, Dost thou think that I am afraid of it? And having it in his hands, he felt along upon the Edge of it, and smiling, spake to the Sheriff, saying, This is a sharp Medicine, but it is a Physician for all Diseases. Then going to and from upon the Scaffold, on every side he pray'd the Company to pray to God to assist him and strengthen him.

And to being asked which way he would lay himself, on which side the Block, as he stretched himself along and laid his Head on the Block, he said, So the Heart be right, it is no matter which way the Head lieth. And then Praying after he had forgiven the Headman, having given him a Sign when he should do his Office, at two blows he lost both Head and Life, his Body never shrinking nor moving. His Head was shewed on each side of the Scaffold, and then put into a Red-Leather Bag, and his wrought Velvet Gown thrown over it, which was afterwards conveyed away in a Mourning Coach of his Ladies.

The large Effusion of Blood, which proceeded from his Veins, amazed the Spectators, who Conjectured he had stock enough left of Nature, to have Surviv'd many Years, though now near Fourcore Years old. He behaved himself at his Death, with so High and so Religious a Resolution, as if a Christian had Acted a Roman, or rather a Roman a Christian: And by the Magnanimity, which was then Conspicuous in him, he abundantly Baffled their Calumnies, who had Accused him of Atheism. Various were the Repentments of his Death, and several Pasquils (as it always happens on such Occasions) were scatter'd abroad. Of the Gallantry of his Behaviour on the Scaffold, these following Verses may give a Confirmation, and a Taste of the Poetry of those Times.

Upon

Upon Sir Walter Raleigh's Execution and Death.

Great Heart, Who taught Thee so to Die?
 Death yielding Thee the Victory.
 Where took'st Thou leave of Life? If here,
 How could'st Thou be so far from Fear?
 But sure Thou dyed'st, and quid'st the State Of Flesh and Blood, before that Fate.
 Ell'e what a Miracle were wrought
 To Triumph both in Flesh and Thought?
 I saw in every Stander by Pale Death, Life only in thy Eye.
 The Legacy thou gav'st us then,
 We'll Sue for, when thou Diest again.
 Farewel, Truth shall this Story say,
 We Died, Thou only Livd'st that Day.

Thus Died that Knight, who was Spain's Scourge and Terror, and Gondomar's Triumph; whom the Whole Nation pitied, and several Princes interceded for; Queen Elizabeth's Favourite, and her Successors Sacrifice. A Person of so much Worth and so great Interest, that King James would not Execute him without an Apology. One of such incomparable Policy, that he was too hard for Essex, was the Envy of Leicester, and Cecil's Rival, who grew jealous of his Excellent Parts, and was afraid of being supplanted by Him. His Head was wist on the Secretaries Shoulders, and his Life valued by some at a higher Rate than the Infanta of Spain; though a Lady incomparably excelling in both the Gifts of Mind and Body.

Authors are perplex under what Topick to place him, whether of Statesman, Seaman, Souldier, Chymist, or Chronologer; for in all these he did Excel. He could make every thing he Read or Heard, his own, and his own he could easily improve to the greatest Advantage. He seem'd to be born to that only which he went about, so Dexterous was he in all his Undertakings, in Court, Camp, by Sea, by Land, with Sword, with Pen. Witness in last, his

SECT. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

OD, whom the Wist Men acknowledged to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an understanding which it self can only comprehend; an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: In the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he imbraceth, fillett, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that Glory which cannot be measured; and withal, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven we perceive a shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful Provision for all that live, his manifold Goodness: And lastly, In creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightiness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, was created with the Deep (meaning with Waters) as with a Garment, faith David. And if by natural Arguments it may be proved, that Water by condensation may become Earth: the same reason teacheth us also, that Earth rarified may become Water: Water, Air, Fire, &c. and so on the contrary.

Don Ignis substantiam per se in Aquam convertit: God turneth the substance of Fire by Air into Water: For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state in which they were created, as touching their Substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of Beauty and Ornament.

*Calum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita sit. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latin Translation simply, and as specific Water: but the same more properly signifieth Liqueur. For (according to Montanus) *Eis autem Maim Liqueur geminus, & hoc nomen proprie verborum ponitur, Latine lingua plurali nomen Aquar fecit: For Maim (faith he) is a double Liqueur, (that is, of divers natures) and this name word of the Latins, wanting a vice to express it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Maim, or indigested Matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without Form, that is, without the proper Form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the Waters.

And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any Creatures, or adorned with any Plants, Fruits, or Flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the Waters, and wrought this indigested Matter into that Form which it now retaineth, then did the Earth bud forth the Herb, which sedeth Seed, and the fruitful Tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good: which Attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect; for Perfection is that in which nothing is wanting. Et Perfecti Dei perfecti sunt Opera: The Works of the Perfect God are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Domogogon; Hefiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: Of which Ovid

Ante Mure, & Terræ, & (quod regit omnia) Cælum,

Unus erat toto nature vultus in Orbe, Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide,

In all the world one only face of Nature did abide:

Which Chaos high, a huge rude heap.

SECT. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

AFTER the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without Form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebat, moved upon or over: inquiebat or movebat (faith Hieronymus) out of Basil and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meo iudicio, sed vivi cuiusdam Syri sententiam recognoscere (faith Basil;) which words incubare or sovere, basil Heb. am. *important warmth, hatching, or quickening, have a special likeness. Verbum translatum est ab avibus pulcritudine incubantibus, quævis spiritibus, & plantis incarnantibus, non autem corporali modo: The word is Translatum *from birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volabat: The Spirit of God did flutter: The Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense. Tenus & confectus Dei fuggit: or, as other understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellobat, removebat: The Wind from the Face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon according to the 147. Psalm, He causeth his Wind to blow, and the Waters increase: but there was yet no Wind nor Exhalation. Aris Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elabim Mraethet, est, officiator mutans, confectus, ac agens super facies gentis liquoris: The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and enlivening, quickening and stirring upon the face of this double Liqueur.

For he maketh four Originals, whereof three are Agents, and the last Passive and Material, to wit, Causa, finis, free cit, Let it be, or, it shall be. Que vox natura, Verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which Voice (faith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God.

The third, Spiritus Elabim, the Spirit of God, id est, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac presens, per omnia peritans, omnia completis: that is, A certain Divine Power, or strength every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materias ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis: Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am relieved, (Cum Deus sit super rationalem animi ratione, Scilicet Deus in alia ratione obiectum) that although the Effects which follow his wonderful ways of working, may in measure be perceived by Man's Understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his Divine Power, could not be conceived by any Mind, or Spirit, compassed with a mortal Body. *Animalis homo que Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (faith the Lord in Ezra)* are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways. And as the World hath not known God himself, so are his ways (according to St. Paul) past finding out.

O Righteous Father, the World hath not known thee, faith Christ. And therefore, whether that Motion, Vitality, and Operation, were by Incubation or how else, the manner is only known to God. *Quomodo in omnia sit rebus vel per spiritum, vel per potentiam, intelligit noster non capit: For how God (faith St. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by Effluence, Presence, or Power, our Understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil ultra Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference between God and Man, if Man's Understanding could conceive the Counsels and disposing of that Eternal Majesty: And therefore to be overcurious in searching how the All-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his All-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave Form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Food, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their Depths: for to do the one lose his Life, and the other his Understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his Light, as long as we look towards it but tenderly and circumspectly: we warm our* our selves safely while we stand near the Fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to censure curiously: this is true, That the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of Motion proceedeth all Production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this Omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient Cause, St. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost: sometimes for a Wind or Breath: Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Terrentian and Theodore call it also a Breath or Wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum sensum intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Motem: Tollatus, Voluntatem & Mentem Dei, The Will and Mind of God: which Moto, Plato in Times maketh Animam Mundum, The Soul of the World: And in his sixth Book, de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of Things to come, and the Presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Moto defuit, vox flet, & non mea sentent, sed etiam Angelorum, My Mind faileth, my Voice is silent, and not mine only, but even the Voice of Angels: So may all Men else say in the understanding and utterance of the Ways and Works of the Creation; for to him (faith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed confusantiale illi est, quicquid est, & quicquid est, & whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the Waters, cannot be taken for a Breath or Wind, nor for any other Creature, separate from the infinite active Power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth and giveth continuance to the Universal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all things; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, faith Salomon. If thou find forth thy Spirit (faith David) they are created. And Gregory, Deus suo presentia efficit, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum disfluere videretur: God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the World was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of God's Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expressed excellently.

And this was the same Spirit which moved in the Universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, faith

Job. So God moved upon the Waters, and treated in them their spirituality, and natural Motion: Motion brought forth Heat; and Heat Rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby operation to every Nature, while it moved upon the Waters, which were in one indigested Lump and Chaos, disposed to all Forms alike) was begotten Air: an Element superior, as lighter than the Waters: through whose vast, open, subtilty, Diaphanicy, or transparent Body, the Light, afterwards created, might easily transpire: Light for the excellency thereof being the first Creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. The Spirit Chrysostom calleth a Vital Operation, Alpis a Deo infans, ex qua Aquæ non solum motu, sed & vim procedent animalia habuerunt. He calleth it, A Vital Operation given by God unto the Waters, whereby the Waters had not only Motion, but also Power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

SECT. VII.

Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of Motion and Heat annexed unto it.

THESE Waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: And this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Instrument of Created Light. For this first and dispersed Light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the Night from the Day, but with a reference to the Sun's Creation, and the uniting of the dispersed Light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be Lights in the Firmament, to separate the Day from the Night: which Lights in the Firmament of Heaven were also made for Signs, and for Seasons, and for Days, and for Years, implying a motion infinitely to follow, by which Days and Years are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which that Time (which was the measure of Motion) began. For that space of the first three days which preceded the Sun's creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any Motion to be measured; and the Day named in the fifth Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sun's motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the Matter of Air, the Firmament, and of the lower and upper Waters, and of the Seas and Creatures therein; Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Man's Body: So may Light (for excellency-like) be called the Chaos, or material Substance of the Sun, and other Lights of Heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing sensible is that Light it self, Sive causæ sit, sive lucidiorum, Which is the cause that things are lighted, (though it make it self and all things else visible:) but a Body most illighted, which illuminateth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the supposed Element of Fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all Bodies living in this our Air. For this Light, Autem collecta, Volubilitatem & formam omnium Cælestium virtutum, & impressionum: The Conductor and Preface and Nourisher of all Celestiall Virtues and Impressions; nothing descending of Heavenly Influences, but by the medium, or means of Light,

Orthus say (as Purific) that it cannot be Matter, because no form so excellent as it self is incorporeal: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the Subject: For light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in existence. Secondly, If Light were proceeding from Matter and Form, then either or both must be one of these, * Lucid or Bright, Dark or Opaque, Diaphanous or Transparent; but Dark-ness cannot be parent of Light; and things Diaphanous (being neither Light nor Dark-ness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the Matter, or Form, or both, be lucid and thinning. Lucid and thinning obtain their being of the Light; and therefore if we derive this

Lafily, If we may behold in any Creature any one Spirit of that Eternal Fire, or any far-off dawning of God's glorious Brightness, the fame in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light may be perceived. Therefore was God called lumen, lumen and the Light, by Armen, named Lux Serapis; and Christ our Saviour fad to be that Light which lighteneth every Man that cometh into the World. Yet the purity of God's incomprehensible fublimity, and piety, this is alfo true, that God is neither a Mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a Light, luch as can be difcerned. Don profecto non Mea est, at vultus fit Mea caelestis; non Spiritus, sed caelestis quid Spiritus exeat; non Lumen, sed caelestis quid Lumen exeat: God (faith Hermer in Peruand-) certainly not a Mind, but the cause that the Mind lasteth in being; non Spirit, but the cause by which every Spirit is non Light, but the cause by which the Light exifteth, Joh. 1. 9.

Ex 14: 46.

So then the Mist and Chaos being first created void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and Motion, resolved their thinner parts into Air, which God illuminated; the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with Waters (participating of the fame Divine Virtue) brought forth the Moss of the Earth that feedeth Seed, of which Moss and Organisms by which this operative Virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also Motion and Heat; which Heat caused the generation of the Worm, which was the first of the Beasts.

nuance of those several species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament : And whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the Waters, and Light was created; God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the Waters, and let it separate the Waters from the Waters; that is, those Waters which by rarefaction and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and

Sea. But these Waters separate above this Extension, which the Latin Translation calleth Firmamentum, or Expanse, (for to Vatallu, Pagine, and Junin turne) are not the Caylliane Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which Opinion Erasmo Magnus calleth a childish position, making in the same place many learned Arguments against this Infancy. For the Waters above the Firmament are the Waters in the Air above us, where the firme is more solid and condense, which God separated from the nether Waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vail place: the words Kapnia (which Montanus writeth Rakigia) and Shamigin, being indifferently taken for the Heaven and for Air, and more properly for the Air and Aether, than for the Heavens, as the best Hebraicians understand them, Quae superflua sunt remota ab inferiori crafting disticta, interduca *bediesque separata, for that whereby the supreme and thin Bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters; and the waters above the Firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that Tongue taken properly for the Waters above the Air, or in the uppermost Region of the firme.*

And that the Word Heaven is used for the Air, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the bleedings of Jofeph, and in the 104. Psalm: * By thy Springs hath the Fowl of the Heaven: and upon Sodom and Gomorrab it rained Brimstone and Fire out of the Heaven: and in Abac's Blessing to God give thee therefore of the Dew of Heaven: And in Deuteronomy the 11. But the Land whither you go to possess it, is a Land that drinketh Water of the Rain of Heaven: And in Job, Who hath ingendered the Frigs of Heaven? And in St. Matthew, Behold the Fowls of Heaven, for they have not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout is the word Heaven very oft used for Air, and taken also hyperbolically for any great Height; as, Let us build us a Tower, and we will go up yeach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his own words be these; Et quicquid dicitur Firmamentum Caelum, non appellatur aliis vocibus propriis accommodatis, suis autem suis et similitudinibus. And God called the Firmament Heaven: this Appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to Aether, (that is, to the Starry Heaven); but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the Waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Air, and not the Heaven, the words of Mose in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the

But that the Stars and other Celestial Bodies incline the Will by mediation of the sensitive Appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted; Corpora Celestia (saith Dante) constitunt in nobis habitus, complexionem, & dispositionem; The Heavenly Bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexion, and disposition: For the Body (though Galen incline it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the Mind, especially Bodies strong in Humour, and weak in Virtues; for those of choleric Complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof, by which they suffer themselves to be transported; where the Mind hath not reason to remember, that Passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless Mind, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortal, as Birds, Beasts, and the like, are left to their natural Appetites; over all which, Celestial Bodies (as Instruments and Executions of God's Providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of Men, who little differ from Beasts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth against those enforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the Remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his insatiable appetite: Placuit satum si resistit, vincit si contemnitur; His Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect it, it conquers.

Quint.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the Minds of Men immediately, it is absurd to think, other than as aforesaid, as the frame by the Body's temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & perficit; The Light of the Sun (saith St. Augustine) helpeth the generation of the sensible Bodies, moveth them to life, and nourishes, augments, and perfecteth them: Yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sun is good to serve, not to sway, (saith St. Ambrose). And St. Augustine, De civitate Dei, Dei regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the Bodies below by those above. But he avoucheth not, that superior Bodies have rule over Mens Minds, which are incorporeal.

Hex. lib. 4. de term.

But howsoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the frame, and weaken their Operation; and Arifotle himself confesseth, that the Heavens do not always work their Effects in inferior Bodies, no more than the signs of Rain and Wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal Virtue and Vice hath his counterworking to these Inclinations. Eft in juvenis Patrum virtus; In the young Offspring the Father's Virtue is; and to the contrary, Patrum vitia; And herein also there is often found an interchange: the Sons of virtuous Men by an ill constellation become inclinable to Vice, and of vicious Men to Virtue.

Hex. lib. 4. de 30.

Egregia est soboles fœderata nata Parente:

A worthy Son is born of a wicked Father.

But there is nothing (after God's reserved power) that so much stretch this Art of Influence out of square and rule, as Education doth: For there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up may fashion anew and reform; nor any so well disposed, whom (the Reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute Men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a favour of their first Liquor: it being equally difficult, either to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet favour of virtue first received, when the Mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable Constellation, (allowing that the Stars incline the Will) and a virtuous Education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both; thereby it is that Men are found to exceed virtuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: For as the Seeds of Virtue may by the art and husbandry of Christian Council produce better and more beautiful Fruit, than the strength of Self-nature and Kind could have yielded them; so the Plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into Weeds, by being set in a Soil suitable, and like themselves, are made more unfavourable, and filled with Poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientis adjuvabit opus Astorum, quædammodum Agricola Terræ naturam; A wise Man affords the work of the Stars, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the Soil. And Proclus himself confesseth thus much, Sapienter, & omnia sapientia Medit, dominabuntur Astris; A wise Man, and the omniscient Art of a wise Physician shall prevail against the Stars. Lastly, We ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the rest of the Universal; whose Influence may be called his reserved and unwritten Laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Laws of Men do; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Laws decreed, That a Thief and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Laws do not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without retrograde, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to Judgment, Power, or Confidence: The Law in its own Nature, being no other than a deaf Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes, for causes to themselves known, and by meditation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being Mercy, Goodness, and Charity it self. Otherwise that Example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil; has been no other, but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own Creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and Desires may not frustrate and break asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternal Power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kind have thrust up himself therein; How miserable then were the condition of Man (saith St. Augustine) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the Stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his Creatures; he be Pagan or Christian that do believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be deposed of all Worship, Reverence, or Respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himself claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the Work, which thou gavest me to do;) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the Torment and Torment of

Mat. 6. 23

Offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or Influences of the Stars, or subject our Souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Platonius, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less than their due; and therefore as I do not consent with men, who would make those glorious Creatures of great virtueless: So I think that we derogate from his eternal and absolute Power and Providence, to ascribe to them the frame dominion over our immortal Souls, which they have over all bodily Substances, and perishable Natures: for the Souls of Men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that Divine Light it self, whereof the Sun's clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a Shadow; Lumen est Umbra Dei, Deus est Lumen Luminis; Light is the Shadow of God's brightness, who is the Light of Light: But to end this Question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Preference, and Predetermination, are often confounded, I think it not pertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every Man hath not observed it, though all learned Men have.

Of Preference.

PREFERENCE, or Fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præsentia) considered in Order and Nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of Men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Preference is no other than an infallible Fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Preference of God (as it is Preference only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: Neither doth God's fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will Rise and Set; that all Men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Summer and Harvest; and that according to the several Seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of Grain; is yet not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the Sun to Rise and Set, or Men to die; for the causes (as Men perceive themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of Man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye itself that such a Beast is a Horse; it seeth Men, Trees, and Houses, &c. But our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own Nature. And again out of the same Author; Divina providentia rerum gerendis non imperat necessitatem, quia si omnia essent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & pena malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of Evil.

Boetius de consol.

S E C T. XIII.

Of Providence.

NOW Providence (which the Greeks call Proνοια) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Preference (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith St. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the Past; Knowledge of the Present; and Care of the Future: And we our selves account such a Man for provident, as remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us herof; and besides the Scriptures, Homer, Orpheus, Æsop, Pythagoras, Plato, Plinius, and (in effect) all learned Men acknowledge the Providence of God; yea, the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most plentiful Difficulties, nor flinch any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving Providence are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Singula Deus (saith David) constituit the Heavens with Clouds, and prepares Rain for the Earth, and maketh the Grass to grow upon the Mountains; and giveth the Beast their Food, and feedeth the young Ravens that cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them Food in due season; And thou shalt drink of the River Cherub (saith God to Elisha) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold the Fowls of the Air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them. Again, Are not two Sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: Yea, all the hairs of your head are numbered. And St. Peter, Cave all your care on him, for he careth for you. And his Judgments are written, And David, God therefore, who is every-where present, will fill the Heaven and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the Righteous, and his Countenances against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called Oculus infinitus, an infinite Eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his Power to another: for it is contrary to his own Word, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo; I will not give my glory to another. Do Man commandeth in the King's presence, but by the King's direction; but God is every-where present, and King of Kings. The example of God's Universal Providence is seen in his Creatures. The Father provideth for his Children: Beasts and Birds, and all Living, for their young Ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universal: and if there be a natural loving care in Men and Beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this Nature, and whose Divine Love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universal: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum Universi (saith Plato): Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, Mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobilitate sustentaculum, ac nervorum machine fundamentum; The Love of God is the perpetual Knot, and Link, or Chain.

caral sense? By this Breath was infused into Man both Life and Soul; and therefore this (Soul) the Philosophers call Animam, que vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give Life to the Body. The infusion of the Almighty grew understanding, faith Job; and this Spirit which God breathed into Man, which is the reasonable Soul of Man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the Body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesi. 12. cleftures; And Dust shall return to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the Spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually other-wise taken in the Scripture than for the Soul: As Job 32. 7. 10 when Stephen cried unto God; Domine suscipe Spiritum meum, Lord Jesus receive my Spirit: And in St. John, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost; or Spirit; (which was) that his Life and Soul left his Body dead. And that the immortal Soul of Man diffused from the Souls of Beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest; for it is written, Let the Waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing, according to his kind, the Beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let us make Man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his Face the Breath of Life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were thence Creatures brought forth, and thence received Life: so that they again be dissolved into the same first Matter whence they were taken: but the Life of Breath evaluating, which God breathed into Man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

SECT. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little World: With a digression touching our Mortality.

Man thus compounded and formed by God, was an Abstract, or Model, or brief Story in the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation and work of the World, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a Divine Understanding, by which he might contemplate and serve his Creator, after whose Image he was formed, and endued with the Powers and Faculties of Reason and other Abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other God's Creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living Natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal: giving to Angels an Intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual Nature, he vouchsafed unto Man both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto Man: and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzen) Homo est utriusque Nature vinculum, Man is the bond and chain which tieth together both Natures: And because in the little frame of Man's Body there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts thereof; therefore was Man called Microcosmus, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnam, atque corporalem, in Terris statuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the Man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the Flesh of Man, and therefore heavy and lumpish: the Bones of his Body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; Of which David:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, enduring pain and care, Approving, that our Bodies of a stony Nature are.

His Blood, which disperseth it self by the Branches of Veins through all the Body, may be resembled to those Waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the Earth; his Breath to the Air; his natural heat, to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it self; which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our natural Moisture, Oil, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the Hairs of Man's Body, which adorn or overshadow it, to the Grass, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative Power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our Determinations, to the lights, wandings, and unstable Clouds, carried every-where with uncertain Winds; our Eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our Youth to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the mere puffs of Wind blow them from the Stalks; the thoughts of our Mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Mour, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual Natures, which are always present with God: And lastly, Our immortal Souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the Title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no Man just, or good, or righteous, (for In Angelis depronuntia est iustitia, Rebeld, He found folly in his Angels, faith Job); yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the Substance and the Shadow, there may be found a goodness in Men: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called Man the Image and Similitude of his own Righteousness. In this also is the little World of Man compared, and made more like the Universal, (Man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras): That the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of Man the seven Planets; Whereof our Infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercury, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the days of Love, Desire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful Age of Man's Life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory; and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our Understanding; the last, and seventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are sad and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the losses which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are Sicknesses, and variable Intimities; and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unobscurable to others, we become a burthen to our our selves; being of no other use, than to hold the Riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as afore said) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal Habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of Death, finish the sorrowful business of a wretched life: towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: Neither have those beloved companions of Honour and Riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of Entertainments: but by what crooked Pathsoever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the House of Death, whose Doors lie open at all hours, and to all Persons. For this Tide of Man's Life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again: Our Leaf once fallen, springing no more; neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again with the Garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

To which I give this sense.

The Plants and Trees made poor and old By Winter envious, The Spring-time bounteous Covers again from shame and cold: But never Man repair'd again His Youth and Beauty lost, Though Art, and Care, and Cost, Do promise Nature's help in vain.

And of which,

CATULLUS, EPIGRAM. 53.

Sæles occidere & redire possunt: Nobis cum finem occidit brevis lux, Nox est perpetua una dormienda.

The Sun may rest and rise: But we contrariwise Sleep after our short light One everlasting night.

For if there were any baiting-place, or rest, in the course or race of Man's Life, then, according to the Doctrine of the Academics, the same might also perpetually be maintained: but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the Sap and Juice, wherein the Life of Plants is preserved, doth ever-more ascend or defend so is it with the Life of Man, which is always either increasing towards ripeness and perfection, or declining and decaying towards rottenness and dissolution.

SECT. VI.

Of the free power which Man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

These be the Miracles which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his Creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him a mortal and Immortal Life, a Nature Celestial and Terrene; and (indeed) God gave Man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Director, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. God made Man in the beginning (saith Sirach); and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Ecclesi. 15. 14. Such was the liberality of God and Man's felicity: where as Peasants, and all other Creatures reasonable, brought with them into the World (saith Lucretius), and that even when they first fell from the Bodies of their Dams, the Nature which they could not change; and the sensual Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as afore said) God gave unto Man all kind of Sculs and Grades of Life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof whichsoever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should finally grow in him, and bring forth Fruit agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first Man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Alexander Athonensis (saith Mirandula) in the Perlon and Fable of Protes; who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and ancient Poets, wherein it was painted, that Men were transformed into divers shapes of Beasts, thereby to shew the change of Mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other Creatures did those Ancients represent the variable Passions and Affections of mortal Men; as by Serpents, were signified Deceivers; by Lions, Oppressors, and cruel Men; by Swine, Men given over to Lust and Sensuality; by Wolves, ravening and greedy Men; which also St. Matthew resemblieth to false Prophets; which come to you in Sheep clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: By the Images of Stones and Stocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungrateful Men: Of which St. John Mat. 3. 7. Baptists, O ye Generation of Vipers, &c.

SECT. VII.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

IN this Work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a Man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisset effi scilicet vult nihil, to will to make, faith Bede. Neither did God rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day. Gen. 1. 18. (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of Creatures, but (as afore said) gave unto Man a power generative, and so to the rest of living Creatures, to Plants and Flowers, their Seeds in themselves; and commanded Man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth Creatures according to their several kinds: All which being finished, God saw that his Works were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were: for God made every Plant of the Field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of Good; thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing bad, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple purity, and from so excellent a Cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect Effect. For Man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of Man's Heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all Creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the Righteous Man, Noah and his Family, with those Creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the Place of Paradise.

SECT. I.

That the Seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that Men should err.

Concerning the first Habitation of Man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he made, Gen. 2.6. Of this Sacred place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the Opinions and Judgments have been in effect as divers among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as uppon any one place therein seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the Terrestrial Paradise, withoutall regard of the World's Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Mose wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things to observe Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Vadianus) Magnos Errores, magnorum virorum auctoritate persusos, transmittimus; ut ipsi errorum grossi errores, per auctoritatem grandis non sed et persusos. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wiser from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I myself presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by Truth: for they were Men Et hominum et errorum. And to the end that no Man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto Men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nihil inquam desit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. St. Paul confess'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledged thus much, that neither Men nor Angels knew of the latter Day; and therefore, feeling knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to St. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi incertum, (saith Job) ?

But where is Wisdom found? and where is the place Jude Ep. 1. 2. of Understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the Living, and therefore King David found folly in his Angels. Mens Judgments (which inhabit the Houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings; and so the Fathers, and other learned Men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our Salvation depended not.

SECT. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

Now touching Paradise; first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise or no? or whether Mose's description were altogether mystical and allegorical? as Origen, Philos, Fran, Georgius, and others have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers, Pison, Gihon, Euphrates, and Parath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other Mysteries and Significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oil, Wine, Milk, and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis); whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 24 Annotation of his fifth Book, Joh. 228, the last Edition.

St. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, et in nobis principia, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our Souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or Garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or, Understanding; by Eve, the Sence; by the Serpent, Delicacy; by the Tree of Good and Evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the Virtues of the Mind, or in the Mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinthians, c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a Celestial and Terrestrial Paradise; the one into which St. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which which Adam was put by God, Aug. Aug. Chrysostomus was of Opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the Earth; the same being not only defaced, but without the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which Opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words in two several places. First, upon this, Fill the Earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. *Hic ipso etiam quod dicit, Replete terram, dominum universis animantibus, suscipite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram exstantem, et omnigenis (ut tam erat) fructibus constare, sedem et portum illam Adæ, et in quibus God said, Bring forth Fruit, and multiply, and fill the Earth, and subdue it, and rule over every Creature, do clearly show, that the Universal Earth, set or filled with all sorts of Fruits, (as then it was) was the Garden and Seat of Adam, and of his future Posterity. And afterward he acknowledged the place, out of Acts 17. 26. Apollonius ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum idem factum docet, ut habitaret super universam faciem Terre: tota igitur Terra Paradisi esse erat; The Apollonius (saith he) habebat, that God hath made of one Blood all Mankind, to dwell over all the face of the Earth: and therefore all the Earth (saith he) is meant that Paradise. Which Conjectures I will answer in this Opinion, but yet he acknowledged that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Georgius hindeth near the River of Acquis, in the Confinnes of India.*

Part. 16. 126.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the Equinoctial; and Pestellus, quite contrary, under the North Pole: The Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the Opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a Figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible World, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air: Strabo and Rabanus were both sick of this Vanity, with Origen and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Mose Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Mossius. But as Hephias says of Philo Judæus, that he wondered, Quo malo genio afflatus, by what evil Angel he was blown up into this Error: So can I but greatly marvel at the learned Men, who so foggly and blindly wandered; seeing Mose, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the Point of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea or Canaan.

Re: in Gen. Part. 16. cap. 3. Mos. Barceph. de Ind.

Nicodemus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise; and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers, of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (wherewith the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mysopotamia and Armenia;) could rise out of one Fountain, were it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

SECT. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the Earth, the words of Mose make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he had made: And howsoever the vulgar Translation, called Jerom's Translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantavit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis a principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise voluptuous a principio, The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of the Region. For, what sense hath this Translation (saith our Hephias in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure; or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and do both the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, or for a Noun Appellative: which Region, in respect of the fertility of the Soil, of the many beautiful Rivers, and goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their Leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, Pleasance, or Delicacy; as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: And this is the mistaking, which may end the Dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, That as Florida was a Country, so called, for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region, called Pleasure, or Delicacy, for its pleasure or delicacy: And as Florida signifieth Flourishing, so Eden signifieth Pleasure; and yet both are the proper names of Countries for Eden being the proper name of a Region, (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choicest Seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the Translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodore, Gregory; and to the Rabbins, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latins, Serapion, Damasceus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ad initium; for Damasceus's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei minimus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter constructus; Paradise is a place marvelously planted by the hands of God in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guthelmus Parisiensis, a great learned Man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, do both understand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words; After this I will begin to speak of Paradise, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hec incipiam loqui de Paradiso Terrestri, quem plantavit Deus ad initium vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis follows Mose enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum a Deo constium in Terce Terre Orientalis, que dicitur Heden: Heden autem est proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto Capite Gen. ubi legitur, Cham habitasse ad Orientem plagam Heden: For Mose (saith he) doth show most clearly, that Pa-

radise was planted of God in a Region of the East Country, which is called Heden: and Heden is a proper Name; it appears by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East-bordr of Heden. Pererius endeavourerh to qualitie this Translation; for this Particlle (saith he) ab initia, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to thevery first day; alleging this place of Christ, that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better Judgments) the Devil was from the infant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not wherewith to practise till Man's Creation. And for conclusion, Sc. Hieron (if that be his Translation) advieth himself better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (E-don) by (ante) and not (a principio) as, God did set a Church in before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradysum voluptatis Churban; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Psalm a parte Orientali bori Heden Churban; He set on the East-side of the garden of Eden a Church; Bacarus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (E) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text teacheth this sense; That God planted a Garden with Pleasures, (I say so by way) of pleasures. And Bacarus followeth this interpretation, only to the end to find Paradise upon the River of Eden; for so there he hath heard of the Indian Figure in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree; which Consent of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was feated by Majus toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans; and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, and so to the Point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (faith Damasius): affirming, That we always pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out: and yve the Temple of Solomon had the Priests and Sacerdotes, who turned themselves in Service and Divine Ceremonies, always towards the West, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places : (for although Paradise were East from Judea, yet it was West from Perfia) and the ferving of God is every-where in the World: The matter is not great which way we turn our faces, for our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to be- lieve God, that as by Adam's fall we have lost the Paradise on Earth; so by Christ's Death and Passion we may be made Partakers of the Paradise on Hea- ven, and the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, there was no such mystery in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise dwelt, was, lay Eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures always called the People of those Na- tions, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Myssopamia, Chaldeæ, and Perfia: Of which Ovid,

Furus ad Auroram, Nabathæaq; regna recessit Persidæque, & radiis juxta subditæ matutinis.

The East Wind with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his first rising.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the Prophet, threatening the destruction of Jerusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonozor, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood North from Jerusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (a principio) id est, (saith he) a primæ orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that a principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning and Eastward is all one; a principio idem est avoc ad Orientem.

To return to the proof of this place, and that this story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 24 Chap. and the 9th ver. in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for Meat, &c. So as hith it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why is expressed, that he might dress it and keep it: Paradise being a Garden, or Orchard, filled with Plants and Trees of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for Meat: which proveth that Paradise was a Terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was a Garden beautified with a River: expressing also the Region out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden 5. and that Heden is also a Country near unto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezekiel 47. 23.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphonemal answer in these words: Si Paradisum non est Infestibit, non est etiam fons; si non est fons, non est flumen; si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principes; non Pison, non Gihon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non est ficus, non folia, non comeditur Eae de Arbore, non est Adam, non sunt Homines, sed veritas jam Fabula est; et omnia ad Allegorias revocantur: If Paradise be not festible, then there be no Fountain, and then no River; if no River, then no four Heads or Branches, and then not any such River, as Pison or Gihon, or Tigris or Euphrates; no such Fig-tree, or Fruit, or Vine, or Fig-tree; Eadam, did not eat of the Fruit, neither was there any Man; Adam, Man, the truth was but a Figure, and all things of the Scripture are but Allegories. Words to the same effect hath St. Thomas upon Daniel's Confessionarius verum deliramenta, qui non Arbra et imagines in coram fideles, ipsam comentari evetere veritatem, ad Paradisum et Flumina, et Arbores punt Allegorie Legibus se debere subducere: Let the datage of them be silent, who following Shadow and Imager in the Truth, endeavor to subvert the Truth it self, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the River, and the Trees, under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of Knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth Verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the Fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all Beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these Beasts were neither in the third Heaven, nor near the Circle of the Moon, nor Beasts in Imagination: for if

If all these things were Enigmatical or Mythical, the fame might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezekiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech; All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enticed him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be Terrestrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant Men, and he was more large and precise in the Description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture: of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulous and Stubborn Ages, whom he knew (out of the gifts of Providence) to be full of fabulous Inventions; and that if he had not described the Region of Eden, and the Rivers, and how it flowed from Paradise, many of the unbelieving Jesuites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Mankind. And, is it likely there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the fame had been an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrath stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unreasoning sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of God; and like to the Land of Egypt toward Parais: In which the Jesuits have referred to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonian was created: which proverbially, that Paradise it self excels; in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof; being compared to a Seat and Soil of far exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. And whence are their praises of the Elisian Fields, but out of the Story of Paradise? To which also appertain those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Ver erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris, Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The joyful Spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet Flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer; and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their Inventions, by venting the stolen Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane Additions, and disguised by poetical Conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own Speculations and Contemplations.

But besides all these Testimonies, if we find what Region Hodu or Eda was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the fame afterwards was divided into four Branches; together with the Kingdoms of Havila and Cush; and that all these are Ealtwater from Canaan, or the Defarts of the Amorites, where Mofes wrote; I then confesse that there is no Man that will doubt, but that the Allegory was true. And yet I do not exclude the Allegory, because the Scripture is for as well in this there were many things to be said, as in all the Old Testament throughout, and thus being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose, (saith St. Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso corporales: una est eorum, qui tuncmundo corporaliter Paradisum intèger voluerunt: alia eorum, qui spiritaliter Paradisum (videlicet) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque *mundo Paradisum accipitis; (that is) There are three Opinions of Paradies: The one of those Men, which will be it altogether Corporal; a second of those which conceive it altogether Spiritual, and to be a Figure of the Church; the third of those, which take it in both sence: which third Opinion St. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable Judgement: Quendammodo Homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum ueneris sensibile finis: & intelligibile, & duplici specie gaudetrum; (that is) As Man was created at one time, both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove, or Garden, to be taken both ways, and ended with a double form.*

S E C T. IV.

*Why it should be needful to intreat diligently
of the place of Paradise.*

But it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise; and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the fame is also made necessary to suppose. We should conceive that Paradise lay not out of the East, as some have thought, as the Moon; or that it were beyond the firmest of the Ocean, and in no part of the known World; lifted up whence Adam was fald to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few Men in the World that would give credit to the Story. For what could seem more ridiculous than the notion of a place so far off, and so what maketh this Seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Paphlagonia, Ginger, which watereth the East India; and Golconda, which enricheth Egypt: And these two Rivers to far distant, as (except all the World were one) these Streams can no way be comprised thence.

Secondly, If the Birth and Works, and Death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Country, of which no Man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of Men: for Times and Places are approved witnesses of worldly Actions.

Thirdly, If We should reite, or giue place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Gensiv, (though otherwise for their Doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence in any way that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a peece of the World so fit by itself, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the Circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganger, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable World, and in those places where they are now found? Which left any Man think that I enforce, or strain to the world, these are Peter Comenius's own words; Ejz autem locus amantissimus, longo terra & mari traditu & nefra habitabiles Zona speranda, unde cleuatur, ut siqae ad hmanam gloriam attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, situate from our habitable Zone, by a long long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reaches to the Globe of the Moon.

And Moses bemoaned upon this place writeth in this manner, Dirivis hoc quæque refugium volumus, Paradisum vultis habitabilem posuimus esse regione, atque hæc nobis exat terra, quæ non in illius per precipitum delictatæ fuerit tunc cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimeret non posset, quæque impetu impulsu perfugium sub Oceanum exat respirant, modo rursus perfugium exaltantique in hoc a nobis culta vide: which have this sense; Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, That Paradise is fit in a Region far raised above this part which we inhabit; a region it comes to pass, that from thence the Rivers fall down with such a bounding violence, as we see, even as we see with that force to impetuosity and speed, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again rise and beat up in this our habitable World: And to this he addeth the Opinion of Ephraim, which is this; Ephraim dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita posuimus esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdat Regione, non aliter atque Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and so far beyond the Ocean Sea, as it encompasseth the whole Orb of the Earth on every side, as the Orb of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous Explications and Opinions do not bring Question unto Truth it self, or make the same Subject to Doubts or Difficulties, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Nid. million says) in parte Terre mediorum, in the best part thereof, that from thence as from a Center, the Universal might be filled with People and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the World's inhabitation: For near unto this did the Sons of Noah alio dispense themselves after the Flood, into all other remote remote Regions and Countries. And if it be a generous desire in Men, to know from whence their own Forefathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Ancestor from whence all the Strains and Branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several Opinions before remembered, by the Truth it self, and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common Reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God hath planted this delightful Garden.

SECT. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Ang. Chyfa, or rather, that the Flood hath altered, defaced, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no Man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which Opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects) For mine own Opinion, I think neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the Face of Paradise was after the Flood withered and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the Ages of Men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the Soil and Seat had not remained, then would not Moser, who wrote of Paradise about 850 years after the Flood, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moser, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it self were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of Time made it one common Field and Pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remain the same Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, we are sure to find in what Longitude Paradise lay; and learning out of one of these Rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four Branches, we are sure that the Partition is at the very border of the Garden it self. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four Heads: Now, whether the word in the Latin Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise's yet the division, and branching of those Rivers, must be in the North or South side of the very Garden, (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore these Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such dividing by the Flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood that the place could be so altered, as future Ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as afterwards) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what descent of Waters could there be in a Spherical and round Body, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of Waters is either by the strength of Wind, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Flood of the Sea. But that there was any Wind (whereby the Seas are now enlarged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a Wind to pass upon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that until the Waters sank, there was any Wind at all, but that God afterwards, out of his goodness, caused the Wind to blow, to dry up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Air of thick Vapours, and unwholesome Mists: and this we know by experience, that all down-right Rains do evermore differ the violence of outrageous Winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous Billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Floods there could be none, when the Waters were equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bays, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of Waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as afterwards: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the Waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoucheth that one of those Pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which Pillars were set up above 1426 years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the creation of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquity hath avouched. It is also written, that Boreus (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enosh, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruins thereof, Ananias (who commented upon that fragment of the faith, were to be seen in his days, who lived in the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile, and if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enosh, he concluded in this sort: Cujus maxime & ingenio multa fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, vicinis Cais, at ingeni mercatoris, & peregrini refectus. The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cais, as both our Strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give name credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood; over which Cephus was King: whose name, with his Brother Eleuther, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was fund given upon certain Altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruins of this other City, called Enosh by Ananias, might be seen, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the World, built by Cain: the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood were engorged by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountains. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Myriadam excelsus Mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo consurgunt milites, sermo est, Diluvii tempore liberatus. Adnup Myriada there is a high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is said, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, though it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons, (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterward, and ever since, known by the same names, and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark rested: but ultimately, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Flood; as the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved themselves also; but, as Ananias saith, without all Authority, either divine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not to turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when Noah first saw the Flood the second time, he returned with an Olive leaf in his mouth, which he had plucked, and which (until the Trees were discovered) he found not: for otherwise he might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters: for it is written; folium, Olive rapitum, ex decerpum, a leaf plucked, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moser, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds

Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

SECT. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

This conceit of Ang. Chyfaenes being answered, who only gives his opinion for reason; I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Novimagus, Valentinus, Gorgopius, Ercanus, and all these that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Valentinus allegeth, bring forth fruit and multiplies fill the Earth, and subdue its Rule over every Creature, &c. with Acts 17, this of the Acts, And hath more of one blood all mankind, 251 to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adams Posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Universality; Moser would not then have said, Edwards in Gen. 3. 24. Eden, being the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased all out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metastasis, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universe, there shall grow but one Thistle. Novimagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nileus, and Euphrates, (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was fallibly taken for Ganges, and Gidon fallibly for Nileus, although Ganges be a River by Havillat in India, and Nileus run through Ethiopia. The Sundry write Chut for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Novimagus, Gorgopius, and Valentinus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephraim, Cyrillus, and Athanasius. That Paradise was located far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam walked through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all thought of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adams thin-bones must have contained a thousand fathoms, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

SECT. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the Air.

THirdly, whereas Beda faith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (hinc à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Petrus lays it off from Beda, upon Sirabus, and his Master Rabanus) and whereas Rapertus, in his Geography of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearst Heaven's. It may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for fear of the Aëropagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one only powerful God; and therefore did the Devil himself him the wisest.

Justin Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian, and it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden.

Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of Mount Atho (called Aëropolis) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many years) are called Macchis (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preserved till the last Judgment: which Irenaeus and Justin Martyr also believe. But this opinion was of all Catholic Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Council damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this Judgment: Sicut certum est, Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live, so where they live, in Paradise, or elsewhere, is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all the other weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the far distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately

by Hopkins, and Petrus, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inventor.)

It is first thereof alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the Sun's light all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortify the former opinions, Tolstus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those falls of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupa, or over-falls of Nihus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nihus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tolstus (the better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrósio together, to whom Petrus, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in cornu scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini: But I do not remember (saith he) that Tolstus read those things either in Basil or Ambrósio.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his Wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed: in which change Enoch and Elias was cast to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the Earth, saving eight persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

For Tolstus his own opinion, who feared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Air, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it (which Scorus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no fountains in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelm it: this is also contrary to the express letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we see Gen. 7:19. well give credit to Mafius Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirm, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scorus being (as the rest of the School-men are) full of distinction, saith, that the waters flood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by Miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seem to affirm in words, but by Hypothese and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to shift, then to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tolstus, I confess that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Athos, and Arctus, over-arch and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountain-tops, do not find the Athes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence wash'd off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath relieved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self Hills the Air is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I millitru) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any resistance of Air to mount her self by.

SECT. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

THose which come nearer unto Reason; find Paradise under the Æquinoctial line, as Tertullian, Boaventura, and Durandus: judging that the most pleasant and most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the temperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sun. But this is (non causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four Rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees nearer the Tropicks, and so toward the Æquinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenna, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are who go against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and nearest to the Line it self. For hereof Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not be by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed, it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the World, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by trial and the witness of mens travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless

Jump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Ezra) that formed the earth and made it, that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest Regions of the World, seated under the Æquinoctial line, or near it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easterly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brisa) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much maffier it, that there is any inconsequence or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the just interposition of the earth, as for those places which my self have seen, near the Line and under it I know no other place of the World of better, or equal temper: Only there are some Tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this Air and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the World. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have by many goodly Rivers, Fountains, and little Brooks, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, cutting shade, to many forts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, they are crept not under ground to the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona any time despite her withered Husband Vernus, in his Winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vinifera, Vineous Countries: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringing forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that, to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas who misliked this opinion, and followed a work, and (to say the truth) all the School-men were gross in this particular.

SECT. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calosyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved, out of Eisa. 37. and Ezek. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Terrida Zona, it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this. That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well Antient as Modern.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and a few other excepted) fought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised, once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those nations, Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: And after them, the Turks hath fought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the antient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two Considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Mesopotamia itself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are express'd to run out of it: So as it followeth that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserts. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the Rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour-Nations better described. In the Prophet Isaiah, I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Sennacherib by Babylonia: q. b. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as Gofan, and Haran, and Kelpch, and the Children of Eden, which were in Telassar? And in Ezekiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrrians: Ty of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Abhur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens; one of which the Prophet Amos remembereth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces; whereof the first maketh Syria Damascus, or Diaplasia: the second part is that Valley called Acenez, otherwise Comallu; or the Tract of Chamamah, where Affrica is joyned to Arabia the Desart, and where Ptolemy placeth the City of Aravia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Calo-Syria, otherwise Vallis cara, or the Jordan Valley, because the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for cale in Greek is Cava in Latin. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradys, the *Tyr*ers believed this Calo-Syria to be the same which Moses described. For the same cause doth Huglin in his Treatise of Paradys represent Berwald, in that he confoundeth this Eden with the other Eden of Paradys, though, to give Berwald his right, I conceive that he led the way to Huglin, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gihon, as shall appear hereafter.

Now to find out Eden, which as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red-Sea; we must consider where those other Counties are found, which the Prophet Isaiah and Ezekiel joyneth with it. For (saith Isaiah) Gofan, Haran, and Kelpch, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezekiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Abhur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezekiel) The Mark of the people for many Yers. And it hath been the custom, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterwards to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Ifficus, now Lajazzo. Ezekiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding Trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-Town of that part of the World, reciteth both the People, with whom they Commerce, and also what commodities every Country yielded; and having counted the several People and Countries, he addeth the particular Trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy Merchants Yefez, (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things; in payments of blue Silk, and of broyded works, fine Linens, Coral, and Pearl: And afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Ramamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The Merchants of Sheba, and Ramamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all precious Stones, and Gold. Now, these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yield: and because Sheba and Ramamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Bersan Gulf, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, Sweet Gums, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded: and (withall) having Trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of Spices, and plenty of Gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shibans, or Arabians entered by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Teredon, (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonosor, now called Rasfira) thence sent up all their rich Merchandizes by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reached within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they paid to Tyre, as they did afterwards to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now, the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezekiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this Trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Persia, which bordereth them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Selencus, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Selencus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hieronymus thinks it to be Cisephon: but Cisephon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I mean, on the East-side of Tygris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Pliny placeth the Schenuta upon Euphrates, where they play the game to be fordoable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the River of Euphrates reffecteth from the Desart of Palmyra: for these People of Canneh (afterwards Schenute) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves, from their own City of Canneh in Shinar, Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thebes, where Ptolemy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenute by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Selenciis, & Babylonianis omnibus iter est per Schenuta. The Merchants which travel from Syria to Selencia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenute. Therefore those that take Canneh for Charran, do much mistake it. For Charran, was to wifich Abraham came 31. from Ur in Chaldea (called by Geod) and thence alfoin Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distantly named with those of Canneh in Ezekiel (as) Ty of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Abhur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometimes called Charr, and Haran, and Aras, Aras, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aras, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia; or Aras, fluviarius, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, A Country between Rivers: for Mysos in Greek, is medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aras, it is then taken for the City it self, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid). For Strabo in his description of Arabia, giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Calofyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenute, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Desarts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmyra, which lyeth between Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were Neighbours (indifferent) to Charran, and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezekiel coupled together, Ty of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chabur, by Selencia: for Selencia was antiently called Chalanne (wifich Aprian) and so Kabanus Minus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis: the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalor, or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Selencia, and almost the next unto it (as) Thebe, Canur, and Mann. Canur, the one a little to the West of Selencia, and the other opposite unto it; where these Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain fact thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many Ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thebe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, Jdg. 1 or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges speaketh therein in these words: Cunquo revertentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quae est in medio itinere contra Niveum, uadecimo die; When they returned they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Niveus) the eleventh day.

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the High-Priest): Te Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the feat of this City is not doubted of; for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but withall exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craffus the Roman, who for his unsatiable greediness, was called Gorgias avaritia; The Gulf of Avarecia. Whereof Lucan 1.

With Roman blood thy Affrican Carre he defil'd.

But this City Canne, or Chabur, is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of Nimrod, And the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chelch, in the Land of Shinar, or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it self, Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinar, idem sunt (saith Complut). Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid).

Now Shinar being Babylonia and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezekiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrans: and Israh in the threats of Sennacherib saith Tyrans 7. (with other Nations that Sennacherib named the children of Eden which were at Telassar). But before I conclude: where Eden it self lyeth, it is necessary to describe those other Countries, which Ezekiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Ramamah.

It is written in Genesis the tenth: *Moresor the Sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the Sons of Cush were Seba, & Havila, & Sibra, & Ramah &c. And the Sons of Ramah were Sheba, &c. and anon after: asb begit Nimrod: for as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, & Nimrod the Son of Cush, whose elder brother was Seba; though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in value and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Ramamah or Regma took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Ramamah and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which welled it.) For (saith Ezekiel) the Merchants of Ramamah and Sheba, were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all Spices, and all precious Stones, and Gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parcellt Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, Strabo, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and the Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean.*

This part, and the adjoining Country, Strabo calleth Chabarra, where the belt Myrrh and Frankincense is gathered: which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East-side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, (spoken of by Ezekiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatics, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reppreth out of Erythræus, In Persia ex initio Isule est, in qua multi & pretiosi summi signatur: in alia vero, clari & perulicidi Lapilli. Erythræus (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Persian Gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining Stones. Now, the difference between Sheba the Son of Ramamah, and Seba the Son of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech) and Sheba with (Schiv): but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countreys and Habitations are divers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboureth the Red-Sea; and so that place of the 72 Plains expounded Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this fence: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebars, Ezekiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were fenced; and so of those of Sheba, towards the Sea-Coast, and upon it, forth up the Country, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joynted in one main stream, and to through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their Merchandise toward Tyris. And as the Cities of Charan, and Channeh, border Eden on the West and North-west, so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilman on the North-east: Chilman being a Region of the higher Medis, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrasis; which Country, by the Geographers is called Comitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyris. Now, to make these things the more plain, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death, these Monarchies were utterly destroyed.

For it appeareth both in Ezra 37, and in the second of Kings, by the Threats of Rabshake, the while the Army of Affria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Gofan, Haran, Refeph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had re-visited the Affrians: though by them (in a fort) mastered and recovered. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed, as Gofan, and Haran, Refeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Ezra-haddon held Affria, and Mero-dach Babylon, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabshake which lay before Jerusalem (Hezekiah then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed; the King of Babel sent to Hezekiah, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Affrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himself was slain by his own sons in the Temple of his Idols. Ezra-haddon succeeding him in Affria.

To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Mero-dach, Hezekiah shewed all his Treasures as well proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon to undertake the recovery of his conquest and subversion. So as, the supposition of War exceeding between Babylon and Affria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affria, were employed to bear off the incursions of the Affrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) saith Tyrius, signifying as much as a Bulwark against the Affrians. This place Hierosolymianus takes for Refem, others for Selucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellianus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Perfia) calleth Thilaba instead thereof in his 24 Book: It is fenced in an Island of Euphrates upon a steep and unscalable Rock, in so much as the Emperor Julian durst not attempt it, and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Affrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adjoining were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Terdida, having Refeph which he calleth Refepha (on the left hand) and Cannab, (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence, is also found the City of Mausa-Canne, upon Tygris; and all these seated together, as Israhel and Ezekiel have fortified them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affria (which the Chaldeans call Assuria) and Mesopotamia, were of olden confounded; the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominions. Affria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia names transferred (saith Niger), Affria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, as, by Charan or Haran in Mesopotamia; also by Cannab and Refeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place Plantaverat autem JEHOVAH Deus hominem in Eden, ab Oriente, the Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Justitiam nescit ubi in Eden, Regione Orientali, insubstanti Arabie & Mesopotamie; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

SECT. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden, and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seems by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which Epistles in the year 1552 they sent to the Pope about confirming their Patriarch, and Andreas Abbas hath published them, translated out of Syria into Latine. By these Epistles (I said) it seems we may have some farther light for the proof of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tygris, or at least, Tygris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, The Island, by an eminency) I hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtless) remain to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing Kingdoms of Mesopotamia, Affria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hasan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosul or Mosul, from which (as in that which followeth it) shall appear out of Mosul (I it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, That Mosul or Mosul, by Marinus Niger is remembered among the Cities higher up Tygris, in these words, Justa autem Tygris Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quae nunc Mosul dicitur; magne Jani, &c. (that is) By Tygris are these Cities: Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus, which is now called Mosul (which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosul, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mosul (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Affria, seated upon Tygris, and in the Neighbourhood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Selucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Assur in these words:

Ex

Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis que sunt circum Civitatem Mosul (hoc est) Assur, in vicinia Ninive; Of all the Cities and Towns which are about the City of Mosul (that is) Assur, in the Neighbourhood of Nineve. Also Niger acknowledgeth Cesiphon a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Assur, after the Dialer of those Nations, which change S into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Cesiphon, (which is not far off Selucia) for Selucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat near the end of our purpose. For the life of Eden, which lieth in the breast of Tygris, is but twelve miles from Mosul, and that ancient City, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philostrophus, and Simon Sethi, Mosula, and John Leua, Mosul, others Mosul, (though it be not the same with Mosul) is far but a little higher upon the same River of Tygris, near Mosul: so that we are like to find this life of Eden hereabout. For the fame Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mosul, makes it to be below Hasan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tygris.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may think, that the words of the Nestorian, in both their Epistles, speak not of any life in Tygris, called the life of Eden, but of an life in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more improbable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdoms of the World have been, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South-west of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Flood called Shinar, and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Affria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Selencia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Abbas maketh mention, (not that latter Abbas, Disciple of Gallicanus, otherwise by Plutarchus and Athenaeus called Abi, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Phyladelphus; but another of that name, who lived in the time of the Greek by Saint Eliotus. And though by corruption of the ancient Copy it be written in Abbas, Adonis, for Edenis: yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Abbas. For Abbas makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Armenia, calling the Land of Chus Armenia, after the Vulgar and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions (saith Abbas) felleth into the Gulf of Perfia: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name imposed for the swiftness thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden; both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them travel through Mesopotamia, Regions first of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Alfo Stephanus, de Urbibus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates; and the name of Eden was in use in Amos's time, though he spake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Calde-Syria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyned together, and afterwards separate) are two of those four heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being known, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tygris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Septuagint and all others convert Perath and Euphrates to Hiddekel, Tygris omni expostum; And all men understand Hiddekel by Tygris (saith Vatablus). And because that which I have said the life of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-denial, I have here-under set down the words out of the two general Epistles of the Nestorian, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Affria, Perfia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Marys time they had) fifteen Churches in one City called Selucia Parthorum, or Mosul upon the River of Tygris having no sufficient Authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at the least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552, (as above-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such Election, and themselves had: having three hundred years before that, upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had forced to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same stock and kind, who aspired to the same dignity which his Predecessors had held; the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the general Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the fifth Epistle; Verum nos non acceptavimus, nec proclamavimus istum; sed fidei communem ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis que sunt circum civitatem Mosul (hoc est, Assur) in vicinia Ninive, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arabia, ex Israhel que est in medio Tygris, sumimus Eden, &c. I.e. Now this Island of Eden, Mafius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Ne-jirani Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (till he be better understood). And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts (the World, and in the South part of Avicia, which he callith Nisyrans, Tarbitans, Maronites, and Cephis, he goeth on to these words: Mos, audita illius morte, conuersisse ab hoste transiit in illam quam uocat Tigris Idem, quia de decem circiter passibus sua media continet, muris undique cincta, & apertis aëris circum Christiatis hominibus habitata: which is, Now bearing of the death of the Paradise, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultu ously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosul, containing very near miles in compass, and every where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by few other men then Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches, among the rest, he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Gefora, Isola Tigris, Isle Gefora. Furthermore, describing the City of Hofa, Gefora, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædittam Tigris, in saluam, uoti spera impunitam; Above the afore-said Island of Tygris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Gefora, Andrew Theset maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Gefora ou Gefre est une milice de la Rivere du Tigris, & possé que est une terre des plus fertiles de l'Asie. L'Asie, Gefora ou Gefre is in the middle of Tygris, tho' by the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden lieth, and of that Eden which lieth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Mos writeth, and that Eden which he adreth Caran according to Ezechieh, and that Eden which is seated according to the affection of the said Prophet, and conuined with the Nations of Rosib, Cannah, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Affrica, and Babylonia, where the Edemites in Abdallur were garfished to refuse the Affirians, whose diplantation Sirao scrib vaunteth of (as above writen). And lastly, the same Eden, which enbraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

SECT. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which Cruple Matthew Broadbent hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, Gith he, hath these words: Et fluxus egressus de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, quid inde derivatur in quatuor capita: *Quæ uero melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explanatione, fit ita reddendum: Et fluxus erat egressus ex Edene (hoc est) fluxus procedens ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomonem: & inde derivabatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads; Which words (saith Broadbent) do better agree with the Narration and Explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden, (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads.*

The Tygrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluxus egressus de loco voluptatis, et a River went out of the place of pleasure: And so the word (Plax) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile, and so all the word (inde and thence), was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden itself.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written, Let the Earth I. I. send the seed of the Herb that seedeth Seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees: And again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, instead of (Trees): And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God: In medio ligni Paradisus. In the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees). And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Varabius, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for monumenta; Illorum; and he gives an instance in this question it self, as A River, (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may not without good reason, be given to the Objection. That Mos speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may suppose the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Vase the tenth, for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream, (for this is now where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River down stream, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Affrica) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or watheth the whole Region of Affrica (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Affrica. The first branch Pison, is Nabur-mulcha (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Amasia; whence riseth the name of Pisu-Tygris, as it were Pisu-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Harla or Sassana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabur-tror or Nerargis, for Nabur-tror: both which names signify flumen derivatus (a River derived), also Acer-came, quasi Rosarius, for reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: This Gehon leadeth to the first Seat of Chet, about the borders of Chaldaea and Arabia, and is so lit at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Affrica: where, because at length it is called Hiddel or Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place callith it Hiddel from the beginning. The fourth Parab, or Euphrates, is called per exultation, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Orta. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Parab in Mos is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddel is Tygris. For Hiddel goeth (saith Mos) Eastward towards Affra, as we find, that Tygris is the River

River of Affrica proprie dicta, whose chief City was Ninereb, as in Genesis the Tenth it is written, That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Affra, and builded Ninereb, which was the chief City of Affra.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Vlpianus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaith the main stream, called the head of the River.

SECT. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soyl, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was; which, if it be denied, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any Plant thence growing, that they had before the Flood: and therefore the Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Country, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self: for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles, or thereabout, from Ninereb, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Nini sita erat. Hæc Regio, omnium quæ nos videmus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cerealis autem fructu procerando addit ferax est, ut nunquam nisi fructu ducere reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold. The least of Wheat and Barley, being almost four fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Country Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-Tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth bread, Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt: Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Antoninus the Eremitic findeth in this commodity, not inferior to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same Tree, there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East-India they prepare the Cordage for their Ships. And that this is true, Athenæus in the life of Antoninus the Eremitic, confesseth, saying: That he received a garment made there from the Eremitic himself, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees which the East-India so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yieldeth no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) palmæ per omnem Regionem palme sive spinos nascentes; There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place, Antonius Curtius maketh this report: Eunius à parte levis Arabie (ad orientem fertilissime nobilis) regio campotris arebit, inter Tigrim & Euphratem jacens, nam ubere & pingui solo, in a pastu repelit pecora dicuntur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (known for plenty of Trees Odours) there lieth a Champaign Country placed between Tygris and Euphrates, of so fruitful and fat a soil, that they are said to drive their Cattle from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bit in anno friget Babylonis fructus; The Babylonians eat their Corn twice a year (saith Niger). And as Countries generally are more fruitful to the Southward, than in the Northern parts; so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North-border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hæc regio fragibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus. This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sun's neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetual activity. In brief, I say that is the fertility of the ground, that the people there are constrained twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards, wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make our kind of Wheat bear seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees; and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soil, That the second year, the very stubble (or rather falling down of the seeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Uberatius tamte sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restituis sat feger.

SECT. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFTER the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me; seeing necessity it self (and Tygris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris; or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; and Tygris or Rivers, Mos witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be no stranger fancy in the World, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Affrica and Melopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant as any of fame known or discovered in the World: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches; and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no error which hath not some flippery and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who study to be singular) find out (fraining Reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the World matter of contention and jangling; not doubting, but in the variable deformity of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectaries, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and fied for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-dif-guishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia; afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tygrii, took name from Havilah the Son of Cush and Havilah in India, from Havilah the Son of Jethan
the one remembered by Moses, in the discription of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generations of Noah and his Sons after the Flood. For the

Gen. 10. 7. Sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Subti and Raamah 3 and the Sons of Javan were Ophir, and Havilah, &c., of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Javan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Solomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoining, had their names.

29. Now, becaule Ganges is a great and a famous River of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same,

Gen. 2. 11. To water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps, it was supposed; that those four Rivers named by Mose, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence? (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous River after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in themselves they should rather have chosen than Ganges: I mean the River Indus, for its fertility, for beauty, for greatness, and for ability, giving no less fertility to Ganges, but exceeding it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be of the four heads; seeing Indus cometh between it and Tigris; and between Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Perfis, consisting of many Kingdoms. And again, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud Rivers of Indus and Ganges; now called that of the Indians; and so to be said Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Perfis, then how little Ganges; which filleth into the Ocean, little less than forty degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoever readeth the Story of Alexander, shall find that there is no River in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth; as was Araxes; thereon in great Gabtes transported himself, and the great Araxes was then in falling down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof to great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as sweet as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coos, of Asiutus, Acephir, Adris (otherwise Hiratis), Hindus, and Zadus, all which make but one Indus; and by it are swallowed up with all their children and companions, which being all encompassed and made one stream, it crooketh athwart Asia, and then at Cambai vieth the Ocean Sea.

But because Pifw, which compaffeth Hanilab, as allo Gehon, which watereth Cafte, mult fomewhere be Gen. 2. 15.
 joyned with the reft in one body, or at leaft be found to proceed out of the fame Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed; it out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other be Ganger, or Nilus: for Nilus rifeth in the uttermoft of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterrane Sea, and the River Ganger rifeth out of the Mountain Ina- ur, or (as others will have it) out of the Mountain Ma-
ur, or (as others will have it) out of the Mountain Ma-
 the Northern Scythia from India, and which divides North to South into the Indean Ocean. And as for Peiath and Hiddel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the fame Arme- nia by the Georgian Mountains: fo as Ganger, who only travelleth in her own India, and Nilus through Ethi- opia and Aegypt, may divide the land of Eden, or joyned themfelves in one channel, and therefore divide or with either of the other, and therefore divide at any time from thence be feparated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moft.

Therefore the River Pifon, which in Hebrew Havilah, is the fame which by joyning it self with Tygris, was therefore called Pifi-Tygris or Piffo-Tygris, of Pifon and Tygris, which River watereth that Havilah, Gen. 2. v. 12. which Havilah the fon of Cafp gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, to whom of Havilah the Son of Yedion, the Son of Yem, his brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Country of Arabia, Beldium, and the Oxyx fcone. This Beldium is a Tree of the bigness of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain Gum sweet to smell to; but bitter in taste, called also Beldium, The Hebrews take the Loadstone for Beldium. Be-rudiah alfirmeth, that Bela in Hebrew fignifieth Pearl: to doth Yedion and Hieron call it Olagter: be it what it will, a Tree of Arabia, or of Perfian or Sufiana hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Sufiana or Havilah, fretcheth it felf towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence imbraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Perfian Gulf, on the Eaft fide thereof: from which Eaft fide had the Arabians (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Jerome) their great plenty of Gold: v. which Strabo alfo witeffeth, as was fhewed before.

The Greek had a conceit, that Pisón was Danubius: trach.
the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aven-Ezra (which Eph.
kins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pisón into Nilus:
But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellspont, and all Asia the fells between it and Tygris. Now Pisón, which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retain some signe of this name, for where it and Tygris embrace each other under the City of Apa- mia, there do they agree of this name compounded name, and are called Pisogamis. And it is thus I have found me, that from so great antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling found of the first name: for Babylon it self, which I dwelt in so near these Rivers, is by some writers known by the name of Ban-me- das, as by Ptolemy: by Cassiodorus, of Baldace: by Bari- us, of Bagdad; and of Bagbedus, by Andrew Thevet:
and yet all those that have lately felt it, call it Bag- dad. To this River of Pisón Ptolemy indeed with many others, as Strabo, Pliny, Herodotus, Josephus, and Gibbon think it their Mahablar or Maas, or Regius, and Pliny think it Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain of Amara:
and Pliny call Phicrator: by Jonius, Puckehar, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profluvion, or coming forth of Exoprates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra, — Phitarch calls

SECT. XIV.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, 2. Chron. 21. 16.

NOW as Haushah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Ethiopia) force Cen into it, for Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latins follow, Gebon consequently was esteemed for Nileus. But Ethiopia are, as much as black or burntfaces, whose proper Country called Thebaid, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. of which point C. 2. g. See more

are those fo often remembered in the Egyptian Stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopia are very near, or cle directly under the Equinotial line, which is very far from this Land inhabited by the Chusites, where are neither black of colour, nor in any fort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Sepтуагинт, Perevius doth qualine in this manner: There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Perevius will make Cush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petraea) and part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia.

E 2 and

and the Philistines were no Aethiopia. And latly, Mose himself, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words, Thou border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gazar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gazar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth, with an honest excuse, false this Translation of Chus for Aethiopia; yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether mis-understand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Aethiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Pliny in his ninth Book, and eighth Chapter, citeth Homers for an Author of these two Aethiopia's. But the East Aethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Aethiops under Prophetas. And the West Aethiopia is that which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Aethiops called Perofis, Danarietis, with divers other names, which Pliny numbeth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Deserts thereof, faith Pliny out of Homers, Agrippa, and Juba; which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Prophetas John, and the Trogodytes) lie due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Immanuelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Aethiops, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding gross herein, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Mose when he served Pharaoh, in the Wars against the Aethiops: for in that (to make Chus, Aethiops) the true word Madian by miracle over the Red-Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and stretch it in Aethiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the World's Plantation. Again, that Gebon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copy, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Jeremias: And what hast thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, in bibis aquam Gehon? To this faith Pererius, perfecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichon, quae significat Nigrom & turbidum: Truly (faith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichon, which significeth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable Argument, that Chus was ill taken for Aethiopia. Moses married the Daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latine call a Madianite, and not Aethiopsian, as (with Iosephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a Marginal Note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Country of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; as it is written in the second of Exodus, that *Moses fled from Pharaoh into the Land of Madian, and late down by a Well, &c.* And again, in the third of Exodus: When Moses kept the Sheep of Jethro, his Father-in-law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell consociately together (to wit) the Madianites, the Immanuelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all, in one general word, Arabians; and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27, 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Immanuelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Potiphar, Pharaoh's Steward. The Genevians, in a Marginal Note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Immanuelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not alter any man's opinion, he wrote the truth; and these were all Arabians: and so in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandize, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spiceries, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the Trades of Arabia Felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East Indies, all the World is served with Myrrhe and Frankincense, and their Spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulf, as afore said. And in the 39. Chapter, it is said, That Potiphar bought Ioseph of the Immanuelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now to make this the more manifest, it is written, Judg. 6. That when Israel had fown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came upon them: They of the East were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Immanuelites are confounded, here the Madianites and the Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gideon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; as in the Eighth Chapter, vers. 24. these Nations are called Immanuelites, and neither Amalekites, nor Amalekites, chap. 7. v. 25. Gideon desired that every man would give him the golden Ear-Rings, which they had taken after the Victory against Zebai and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 17000 Shukels of Gold, it is written; For they had golden Ear-Rings, because they were Immanuelites. And these Immanuelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Maurus cites contra omnes, & manus omnium contra cum; His hand faith God, of Israel shall be against all men, and every man's hand against him. Of these Immanuelites come the Madianites Arabians, though some Writers think Mabomet to be of the Schuzia. And the Immanuelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Deserts of Sin and Pharan (faith Iosephus) use pysson upon their Arrows, as the Indians do. Toward the South-East are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them towards the Deserts of Arabia, the Amalekites, and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, The ill Translation of Aethiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the Spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Aethiopsians; so Jerome reads it: The Geneva Translation hath it, Which were besides the Aethiopsians. Now, how far it is off between the Philistines and the Negros, or the Aethiopsians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mix and joyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Aethiopia about 32, or 33. degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desert of Sin and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next Neighbours. Nulla sperabit dubitatio quin Stroph. Immanuelites in facie literis sit Arabia propinqua; Quae Arab. in remanet non dubio (faith Strophius) but Aethiopia in Gen. c. 2. the Scriptures, is taken for that Country which joyneth to Arabia.

Now, may we think, it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gebon for Nilus, or Nilus for Gebon. Surely, if Mose had meant Nilus, when he named Gebon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a River of Egypt, Exod. 2. v. 15. wherein

wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gebon. And if Mose had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had decided them: for they had lived there all days of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof, except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (faith Pliny) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Olives instead of good Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichon, once in Isaiah and once in the Prophet Jeremias, and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Aethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Immanuelites had never any communion or affairs with the Aethiopsians, nor any intelligence or trade beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Immanuelites, Amalekites, and Madianites; who being often governed by many little Kings, or Regents, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or Heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Calo-Syrians, with the Magegians, Indolites, and others their adherents. And finally, within themselves, the Nations which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-Coast, as Tyre, Sidon, Ashdod, and many others; yet, Jerusalem it self was withheld from Israel, from the days of Mose, even unto the time of David, by the Jehusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gebon was therein that part of Arabia the Stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and this in this Desert it was, that Matt. Beraldim loth him to be in this Desert: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gebon and Nilus; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hevralab; for I find none such in Yeremias Natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desert.

And as he well proved that Pisbon was not Ganges, nor Gebon Nilus; so where to find them elsewhere, it seemeth he knew not. Certainly, this River of Gebon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterranean at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth far East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza, is but a small stream, siting between it and the Red-Sea, whose head from Gaza it self is little more than twenty English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken, who did conclude of the habitations of Israel in the flood, and when it flourished, being then their next Neighbours, and never looked back to the first Cause and Plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children never retired, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his Sons, first inhabited. Hevralab took the River-side of Tygris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Hevralab, (now Susiana): Ruamab, and his Son further down the River, in the entrance of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gebon, which falleth in the Lakes of Chaldea; and in process of time, and as their People increased; they drew themselves more Westward towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim pass over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now, because there could be no such River found in Arabia the Stony, which they might entitle Gebon, they translated Chus, Aethiopia and Gebon, Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that the Immanuelites or Chusites that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia; and when afterwards, in process of time, the same Brit had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entitled by the same name of Britannia, after Ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus; and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River of Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as the first discoverers shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spain, Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Mose in his description of Gebon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should, or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit; being in after-times they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (by purchase) have been Nations in times (as the Saracens), which came of them, of a great part of the World. For, though the Babylonian Empire which took beginning in Ninrad the Son of Chus, consisted of the first but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalaze; yet we find, that his Successors within a few years after, commanded all the whole World in effect; and the fame of Babel confirmed the memory of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia; and the greatness of that Empire founded by Ninrad a younger Son, obscured the name and Nation of his Father Chus in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entitled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which they retained to the Soil and Territory, by themselves afterward inhabited and held. And we may not think, that Chus, or any of his, could in half creep through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. years after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reed and Tree, to joyn themselves (as it were) into one main Body and Forrest. For if we look with judgment and reason into the Worlds Plantation, we shall find, that every Family fed themselves as near together as possibly they could; and though necessity enforced them, after they grew full of People, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar, or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort and succour one another by River, as the Fields being then (without all doubt) impassible. So Ninrad, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, fate down in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was, to which the greatest troops of Noah's Children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increase. The first Father of men, Adam, had therein his former habitation: The second Father of Mankind, Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Ninrad the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as afore said), which both Tygris and Emphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Hevralab place place himself up in Pis-Tygris; Rasab and his Son Sheba farther down upon the same River, on the Seacoast of Arabia: Chub himself upon Gebon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves further off, yet they always followed themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Charan, Reseph, Cannab, Or in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded upon these Navigable Rivers, or their branches; by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

SECT. XV.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

BUT now to conclude this Dispute: It appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scripture, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram juxiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctial, and 55. from the North-pole: in which Climate, the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyl, Grain of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palm-Trees, without the care and labour of man. For whereinsoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can most vaunt that they have excelled; yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life beggett at Nature's hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West-Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer; yet, lay down by those pleasures and benefits, the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earth-quakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison between one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for man's ingratitude and cruelty) cursed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may safely think, that how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Universal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, and of Knowledge, Plants only proper and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so grand a Lord.

The fun of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have been dim-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our known World: some, above the middle Region of the Air: some, elevated near the Moon; others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Chalks in the Air, and in men's fancies vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward in respect of Judea, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tygris and Euphrates swimming through Eden do join in one, and afterward taking ways apart, do water Chus and Hazab, according to Moses, the true fountains of Chus and his sons being then in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pisus was Ganges, the Scripture, reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joined, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gebon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility; and this River is a greater stranger to Tygris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almost as far off as the Cape of Good hope, and falleth into the Mediterranean Sea; and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth North; the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, therefore and three degrees the one from the other. In this last following, I have added a Chronographical description of this Terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I look for, that my labour may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

SECT. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree; and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

FOR eating the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, was Adam driven out of Paradise. In exilium vite temporalis, hinc the beginning of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubd by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile as nothing can fix them, and so slippery as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World, an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a Plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of lives, because the fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own days, but also given a durable continuance to all his posterity; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his Creatures; Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrudging life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And, as before the Flood the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after the Flood of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed God's first and easy Commandment, the lives of men on Earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first Age, as many learned men have conceived. Chrystom, Rupertus, Tilstat, and others were of belief, that (but for Adam's fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite Wildom of God, as he foreknew that the Earth could not have contained Mankind; or else, that millions of Souls must have been ungenereted, and have had no being, if the first number wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: And therefore that of Chrystom must be understood of immortality of bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a mere Allegorie; taking their strength out of Solomon, where Wildom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life: as out of the Apocalypse, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustine's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a Terrestrial Paradise, so there was a Celestial. For although Agar and Sarah were Figures of the Old and New Testament; yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer foolishness. And so in this place, the sense of the Scripture is manifest: For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to the sight, and sweet to the taste, the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: Which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by God's commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesper, Homer, Ovid, and others, steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they took the Platform of the Orchard of Akincum, and another of the Hesperides; and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young; and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the gods.

SECT. II.

Of Becanus his Opinion, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica:

NOW, for the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, some men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at, whereas Goropius much marvelled. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely, howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he surmounteth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he fetcheth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the regions wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part, and fol. 48. saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-tree; of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acemes, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies; in or near the Kingdom of Persia.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigness of a great Pear, or (as Pliny reporteth) somewhat bigger; and that it is a Tree, So fomer from, Always planting it self: that it spreadeth it self so far abroad, as that a troop of Horle-men may hide themselves under it. Strabo faith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no less than a shield. Aristobolus affirmeth, that fifty Horle-men may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onesirius raiseth this number to four hundred. This Tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bigness, which also Pliny and Onesirius confirm: to the trunk of which, these Authors give such a magnitude, as I shalme to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-Tree is not so rare a Plant as Becanus conceiveth, who, because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the River Aescopus. But many parts of the World have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soil) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head-branches, there issueth out a Gummy juyce which hangeth downward like a cord or fiewe, and within a few moneths reacheth the grounds, which is no sooner toucheth, but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper root, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding height. From the utmost boughs of these young Trees, there fall again the like cords, which in one year and less (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also Trees of the bigness of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight as Art or Nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the World can do. Now, one of these Trees considered, with all his young ones, may (indeed) throug four hundred or four thousand Horle-men, if they please, for they cover whole Valleys of ground where these Trees grow near the Scindabado. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, shooting always downward to find root under water, are, in those Seas of the Indies where Oylsters breed, intrangled in their beds, so by pulling up one of these cords out of the Sea, I have seen five hundred Oylsters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, that Oylsters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles together under them. But to return to Groenius Becanus: This Tree (saith he) was good for meat, and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil is desired to be.

Secondly, This Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other Tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stem: for among ten thousand of them, it is hard to find any one bigger than the rest, and these are all of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, In medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plural number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephais) word for word, is, That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it self was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew near it: because Adam being possid'd with shame, did not run up and down the Garden to seek out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it self; and these leaves of all other were the most commodious, by reason of their largeness, which Pliny avoweth in these words, Latitudo foliorum plantæ effigium Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrastus confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazoni um lunatis agmina pelvis Penthesilea furens.

Virg. Æn.
l. 1. 454.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
Penthesilea leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather choleric) speech, *Quis erit iam impudens obstanti, si hæc a nobis, de sic hæc, ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Moysis narratione comparat, ex antea dicere, Adam arborum inveniri potest, ut cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to avow, That any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my self, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largeness of leaves, nor in fruit to this report; I rather incline to the opinion of Philis, That the Earth never brought forth any of these Trees, neither before nor after. But I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind; only thereby, and by the easie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his obedience: *Prohibita non propter aliud quam ad commendandum pure ac simpliciter obedientiam; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience.

SECT. III.

Of Becanus his not-univally allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it self to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) did Man grow straight and upright towards God, until such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree; Earth, which all the rest of Adam's Posterity after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt World. The exceeding unbragfulness of this Tree, he compareth to the dark and shadowed life of man, through which the Sun of Justice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climb the Tree of the Cross for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived Knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the World most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into chol. and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little; in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shows, and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigness of the smallest pebble, to all the World apparent: goodness, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatness men of power and worldly ability surpass the meane: so is the little fruit of such Men, and such Trees, rather sitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing itateliness, and magnificence. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedness and shame, fought for leaves to cover himself with: thus man serve to put us in mind of his and our first, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

SECT. IV.

Of the names of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil: with some other Notes touching the Story of Adam's sin.

NOW, as touching the sense of this Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the first fruit thereof had, and as touching the property of the Tree it self, Miser Bar-Cephais, an ancient Syrian-Doctor (translated by Masius) giveth this judgment: That the fruit of this Tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab eventu. The Tree of Knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of God's own hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed all men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the breath or Spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of God's Commandment was the fearfullest Evil, and the observation of his Precepts the happiest Good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himself another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glass of his own guilty soul, he beheld therein the horror of God's judgments; so as he then knew, (he feelingly knew) and had trial of the late grief, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be expres'd. He then saw himself naked both in Body and mind, that is, deprived of God's grace and former felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledge, and not because the first thereof had any such operation by any self quality or effect: for the same Phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to ads performed, and things done. In such sort, as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contentment therefore called Ephraim, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Hearersmen of Isaac and Esau contended for them: and the heap of Stones called the Heap of witness, between Jacob and Laban; not that the Stones bare witness, but for a remembrance of the Covenant. So Jacob called the House of God Behel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Vivens, videns.

Gen. 26. 20.

Gen. 31. 48.
Gen. 28. 19.
Gen. 28. 19.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affection, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himself, and looking but slightly (as all his issue do) into the miseries and sorrows, incidents and greatly afflicting the supposed glory which he might obtain by tasting the fruit forbidden: he was transported and blown forward, by the gentle wind of pleasing persuasions, unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtle arguments of Satan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the false ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

But what means did the Devil find out, as what instruments did his own subtilty present him, as what and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; so as by Adam's hearkning to the voice of his Wife, contrary to the express Commandment of the living God, Man-kind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being made for a comfort and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (saith God himself) Cursed is the Earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts into whom the Devil entred and perwaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting for her knowledge, an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yield to her persuasions? Even the false cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namely, an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the Son of David, God's chosen servant, and himself a man ended with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the persuasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other men in succeeding Ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the persuasions of their Wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit pallion of dissimulate sorrow and uneasiness.

SECT. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cain's sin: and of his going out from God.

The fame Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater than he could bear: For the same offence (where-with the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place, Moses giveth a reason: for faith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men only, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murder of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alienis temporibus, sed utrumque simul. God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times, but all at once: And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven (saith David) thou art there; if in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exiit a facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord: (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

SECT. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

This word Nod or Naid, S. Hierom and many others understand to signify wandering, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Junius; but the Security covert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Country, and so doth Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else; and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murder committed, justly fearing, (by his own words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now, that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an Abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortify himself against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jews; and that as Cain after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jews, after they had crucified the Son of God, became Rummages; and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain Estate, Common-wealth, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now, this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of the Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greke Nomades, and by the Latine, Agriores; as the Northern Tartarians, the Gessians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and Norfolks; till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of Tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Affrica, called by Plinius, Calecia, which also might be derived of Caraca, the Country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in these parts, it may be gathered by the first position of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genf. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth Genf. 3. whence he was taken: and in the Verse following, Thou shalt eat of the fruit of the Tree of Life, and shalt dwell therein: but of the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat thereof: for in the day that thou shalt eat thereof, thou shalt surely die. Thus he sent him forth to till the Earth, and to dwell therein: but of the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat thereof: for in the day that thou shalt eat thereof, thou shalt surely die. Now, if the word Nod, or Naid, do signify profection, that is, a fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, then till he built the City of Enoch, the first defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as, for mine own opinion, I am content with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word Vagabond, which Cain useth himself, it seemeth by the perclose of the fame Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travellet in fear of revenge: For whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Enoch; were the first society and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these People (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in memory of Noah and his Sons: so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) these People, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self, where Enoch flood before the Flood, and whereof Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or foundation of Joppa did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place, to call themselves by the same name: for of these Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Thracia, Sogdiana, and Bactria; of the same name many Mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over, or defaced, we may (according to the count of Plato) exceedingly rejoice, and therewith satisfy our selves, if of so great, and almost worn-out Antiquity, of the eldest Peoples names and nations, there remain any Print or foot-steps to Posterity.

In Pliny, P. Melas, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochians, described, though diversely written: as in Pliny, sometimes Henochi; in Mela, Enochi; in Flaccus, Henochi; in Lucan, Enochi: All which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exact and precise, as sometimes he useth the word East, or South without borrowing or addition; at other times with borrowing, as Eastward, or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genf. the eleventh, he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East; they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain, he addeth the word (towards) as, in the land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two, either to the North, or to the South of the East.

But, as we may conjecture, that these Nations took name of Enoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherein it stood, when the fame was re-peopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochians of Calecia, and other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again; because, had this Enoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated North, and not East or Eastward from Pontus. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Henochi, Polony, Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward, he findeth another Nation of them about Berka and Albonia; and beyond these he again discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountains of Para-pamis; between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochians are doe East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

And although we cannot be assured that these He- nochis took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Adam the Frier, who sets Enoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden, being directly West.

And besides these several Nations of the Henochis, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the Steph. 4. same also in the East, with diverse mountains about Hel. Gedras and Sogdiana, of the same name. Only the Gedras (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Henochis) which which signifieth Cart or Coach-men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Cassia and Pollux (to wit) Amphiter and Telchime, who attended them in the interpret of Jafin, into Calecia, Genf. 11. And though I do not deny, but that Jafin, with other Greeks, ranged the coasts of Asia the left, in an open Boat or kind of small Gally, * of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no man doubted but that the second calf of the golden Fleece was for the most part Poetico-falsely and without, that in such an open Boat, which this first there was no place, and less use, of Coach-horses or 13 Strab. 11. Waggoners.

SECT. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

But of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Enoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice: Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the 4 and 5 Chapter of Genf.: against which, for the first, is demanded, How it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Enoch) to go to perform such a Work as the building of a City, to erect a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it beft agreeeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he contained the whole Story of the first Race, which lasted, by the least account, 1056 years, in five short Chapters: Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest Reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generation of mens lives so long a measure as 800, and 900 years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soever: for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of his Issues, Moses had the least care. And as it is said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required, is to be understood: which advice, seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fais autem post-die mulier, or a fine daughter, (that is) In process of time, it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years foregone, and when his people were increased, he built the City of Enoch or Hnoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, fo of Solomon, that he built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he employed in that Work 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing that we find that Cain had no regard to the Ages, Birth or Death of Cain's Issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also pathed over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner; Cain also begot Heth, who conceived and bare Hnoch, and he built a City, and called the name of the City after the name of his Son Hnoch. And to Hnoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Methusael, and Methusael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

Now, of Seib, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner: And Seib lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enosh, and Seib lived after he begat Enosh eight hundred and forty years, and begat Sons and Daughters: so as all the days of Seib were Nine hundred and twelve years, and he dyed: As for the years and times of the wicked, they were not numbered in Libro vintium, fifth Cyrl. But in Seib was the Church of God established; from whom Christ defended, as touching his Manhood; and therefore this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, palling over the reprobate Generation, (as afore said.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembereth but Eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seib, ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth.

I. ADAM.

2 Cain ,	7 Lamech , who by
3 Hnoch ,	Adab had
4 Irada ,	8 Jubal and Tubal : and
5 Methusael ,	by Silla , Tubal-Cain
6 Methusael ,	and Noema .

I. ADAM.

2 Seib ,	7 Hnoch ,
3 Enosh ,	8 Methusael ,
4 Cainan ,	9 Lamech ,
5 Mabaleh ,	and
6 Jared ,	10 Noah .

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josephus giveth unto Lamech Threefore and seventeen Sons and Daughters, by his two Wives, Ada and Silla: and to these sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Fallowage, of Musick, and the working in Metal; for it seemeth that Jubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Doves: Tubal invented Musick, and Tubal-Cain the working in Brass and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees, of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seib began the degrees of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

SECT. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they began their Children.

A Second scruple hath been made. How it came to pass that the Patriarchs began their Children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cetan at seventy years, Mabaleh and Enosh at Threecore and five years, whereas Jared began not any of his until he was 122 years old: Methusael began at 187; Lamech at 182, and Noah at 500 years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusael, or Lamech obtained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enosh who was Translated by God for his singular Sanctity, began Children before he was Threecore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest Sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seib, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestours, were they elder, or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Hnoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-born of Methusael, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Sibem, Hana, and Tapher, though these three were only named, and surviving, and which by God were reserved to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mabaleh to be begotten by Kenan at Threecore and ten years, who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusael began Lamech in the One hundred and eighty seventh year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other Sons of Methusael but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah, as afore said. Of this Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest Sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Jasar, and not Jsmael, Mat. i. 2. though Jsmael were first in time: so doth he take Jasar the younger, and not Ejan the elder: neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Judas a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger Son of Jesse; and lastly, we find, that the Kingdom it self of Judas was not given to the Heir in Nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Solomon.

SECT. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

THE third Objection is, that the great difference of years between those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well near ten a thousand years, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing that that soon after the Flood, men lived not a third part of that time; and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that have hereon resolved that those years were but Lunar years (to wit) of a month or thereabouts, or Egyptian years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seib began Enosh in the year of his life an hundred and five, if those years be taken but for months, then had Seib lived but eight years and one month when he began Enosh; and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance when he began Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have been but six years and forty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the text, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this was too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at six, seven, or eight years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being defended from Adam, the Workmanship of God's hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the World, had length of dates, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunar years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of Nine hundred years, had by that account but the time of Fourcore and ten and odd years; which were not only less by far than the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many men's lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourcore, and some an hundred years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25, That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great years: all which (if the former account were of Lunar years) makes but seventeen and an half of our years.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength, or little differing: for of the first and purest feed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfulllest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt; which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God, for the cruelty of man's heart, brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weakness, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so Time it self (under the deathly shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath waited and worn out that lively virtue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea the Heavens themselves, being of a moist pure and cleaned matter, hath wax old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the Ordinance of God receive operative Virtue from the superiour.

But besides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and simplicity of living differ from that old time? The tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dugge: an unnatural curiosity having taught all women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurses, which necessity only ought to commend unto them. The hasty Marriages in tender years, wherein Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her self hath not yet any root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-price feeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxuriousness of this glutinous Age, wherein we press Nature with over-weighty burthens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucas hath these Elegant verses:

— O Prodigia rerum

*Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta paratis;
Et quæstorum terra pelagique ciborum;
Ambrosia fumes, & laus gloria mensæ,
Discite quàm parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum natura petat.
Non auro myrribaque bibunt: sed gurgulis puræ
Vitis redit: Jussu est populi, fluviusque, Cerefusque.*

O walfall Rite never well content

With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea far stretch and hint;
Vain-glory of a Table sumptuous.

Learn with how little life may be preferred.
In Gold and Myrrh they need not to carouse,
But with the Brook the peoples thirst is served;
Who fed with Bread and Water are not served.

The Egyptians affirm, that the longest time of man's life is an hundred years, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Brontion to an hundred and seventeen years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number, and review of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (fifth Pliny) four and fifty persons of an hundred years of age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten; two of an hundred and five and twenty: four of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or an hundred and seven and thirty years old: and last of all, three men of an hundred and forty; and this farth was made in the times of Vespasian the Father, and the Son.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Essenians, gave them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies: to the Perfians Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm out of Homer, that Nisier lived three Ages, and Thersites fix, Sybillæ three hundred years, Endymion the less Asia, little less: Allo Masanissa of Nimidia lived very long, and Dandis of Byria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (fifth Epiphanius) Heliandus affirmeth of the Epicians, that some of them lived full two hundred years; and so doth Dionysius Siculus of the Egyptians: and that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself; as Mabonius, Berossus, Manus, Ephorus, Hieronymus, Epiphanius, Herodotus, Strabo, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570, there was an Indian presented to Solyman, General of the Turks Army, who had out-lived three hundred years. I may tell knew the old Countess of Desmoud of Indochina in Manfiter, who lived in the year 1589, and many years since, who was married in Edward the fourth's time, and held her Joynture from all the Earls of Desmoud since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Manfiter can witness.

Silvanus Siageia, out of Torquatus, Maflus, and the like Authors, telleth of men: that have not only far exceeded the term prefcribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit age to fresh youth. But for length of life, it we note but the difference between the ability of men in those days wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us, what Needs we are in respect of those Cedars of the last Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Blood fix pound weight, and Plinius for the most part, six pound weight. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Confections) which are the natural caufs of a long and healthful life; to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Air, and temperate use of diet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring fione, cannot fland long upright; on Air we feed all-ways and in every infant, and on meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink under the burthen of her own excess. And for a good constitution, a pure Air, and a temperate use of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

SECT. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition : and that Enoch Writ before the Flood.

A Fourth scruple hath been made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder Ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men fought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jews of infinite price, fearing the irreverent confusion of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the same was not left to publick dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wife unto a posterity equally Zealous; Ex animo in animam (says Isteri, more intercedente verbo: from mind to mind, without Letters; by way of Tradition or word of mouth, &c.) And it was thought by Eldras, Origen, and Hilarinus (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but (withal) secretorum & verum leges enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (faith he, out of the fame Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Japhan, and Japhan to the Elders: for, to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the multitude, were two other quædam dare familiam canibus, et alia dare hominibus; that is, to give holy things to Dogs, and to call Beasts before Sanctuary, &c. succeeding times, this understanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and letters bearing the form of Beasts, Birds, and other creatures; and to be taught only to such as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jew was imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is Receptio in Latine, and a Receiving in English. And this custom was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittain, and of latter times by the Irish Chronicles called Rimers. If then I say as would seem reasonable in the use of reason, will not acknowledge that the story of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the Holy-Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by Tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain premonition, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity have had preferred and left to their successors: which cannot be denied to the Hebrews, who were the first of our wife men (as they term them) did lay up and defend, from the injury of the time and other hazards. For Seth, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his Children and Successors, which cannot be denied, of it, manifest that Methuselah lived together with him, himself two hundred forty and three years, and Noah Methuselah no less than five hundred years; and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledge by an elastic and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But belid this Tradition, it is questionleſs, that the uſe of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by ſeveral Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch of which Jofephus affirmeth, that one of them remained ſtanding in his times (meaning belike ſome ruine or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are aſcribed to Seth. But of theſe Prophecies of Enoch, St. Jude teſtifieth, and ſome part of his Books (which contained the names of the Stars, their names and motions) were after- ward found in Arabia Felice, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (ſiſh Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that he had ſeen, and read ſome whole Pa- ges. It is not therefore strange, that Mofes came to the knowledge of the Creation, and ſtory of the firſt Age, ſeeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letter, had not the ſpirit of God inſtigated and in- ſpired him aſide did : (which alſo his many and ſtrange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifeſt.)

make mention of them, I am that I will show. Orig. 26.
Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gasen, & Ysaac Ysaac. 6.
(others) cite them in their writings: although Medi- comment. li.
na, for an argument to prove them unwritten Tradi- Traditions, allegeth that Pope Gelasius among Tradition
the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) na- 15.
med not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius, that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added therunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add therunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these Books, is, that neither Philos- ophus nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will let this opinion of St. Augustin, Scripſitque eodem nomina di- uina Enoch, illum Epinuchum a Adam, negare non possunt. That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now these writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by to much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (faith Terstilianus) who yet affirmeth, that this Book might be preserved by Nubis, Surely, that Enoch wrote the

The Prophecies

Prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny how they were delivered to posterity. I know not whether by Jehonadab Cabala, or by what other means the time is but to be concluded. And Certainly by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures of the planets of the Stars; and afterwards to knowledge and conjunctions of the Stars, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this book. For it is not likely, that to exorcise knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented; and Francis Bacon, but left by Seib to Enoch, and by Enoch to Adam, as hath been said before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seib to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah, it is not so strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof then self-authority.

SECT. VII

Of the men of renown before the Flood.

NOW let us consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cains children : and of Adam by Seth, ten : Seth being given by God in stead of Abel : and, of Seth was Engh begotten, in whose time men began to profess Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publick. For although Adam intrusted his Children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the Sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel : yet it seemeth that after the death of Enoch, men began publicly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord ; and thereby were the Sons of God, or the Godly, distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enoch the Son of Seth, to the time of Hezech the Son of Jared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their piety, the birth of their Sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Hezech, Gen. 5, 24, noob it is written : That he walked with God, and he was no more seen : for God took him away. By that, that he walked before God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah ; Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch, placuit Deo ; Enoch pleased God. And although Adam, Ezer, and others, understand this place, (tulit cum eo) seculum, mortuus est ; God took him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Seventy, and with our manner of speech to this day. For God took him away when he died ; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the piety of Hezech, and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Hezech was not distressed as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he dyed : but of Hezech he speaketh otherwise, saying only, He was missing, or, he was not seen. Etenim invenimus (saith the Apostle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum transiit ; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Henach were not with the same kind of changing which St. Paul promiseth, when he saith, that, when the end the end shall come, we shall not all die, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Enosh, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death : saying that Lamech prophesied of his Son Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the War, Peace, Government, and policy of these strong and mighty men, to abide both in body and wit, there was no number: maintaining: wholy florides, if they had been preferred, and what else was then performed in that newweld of the World: there could nothing of more delight have been left to Posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and natural wits, had the experience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of necessity must the fame add of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of aftertimes: especially in respect of this old age of the world, when we can never begin to know, but we begin to die: according to Proverbs: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præcepti (wherein) Life is short, art is long, time is heeding. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses: These were mighty men, which in old times were men of renown. But these men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their own abilities, as they forgot altogether the power of Sin, and the ways wherein Heaven walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil and continually evil. And this wickedness was not only found in the giants and Sons, but was then universal, when the children and mischief of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mislead by their idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the World only.

That these Sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of Women, accompanied them, and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Latinians, and Enchirius, misled by Josaphus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterwards changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needfuls: the question being incapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostom and S. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in Scripture: and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who as Christ himself beheld the face of God, (that is) always attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Jacobi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnels to imagine.

SECT.

SECT. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also, divers in later times.

OF these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Gorgias Beaman an Amoritan (who thought his own wit more Gigantical than the bodies of Nimrod, or Hercules) hath written a large Discourse, intitled, Gigantomachia; and trained his brains to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may find them in the Treatise before named. It is true, that Cyrillus reproves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirm shamelessly, That the Giants have in elder times, not only cast up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hills, and making War with the gods, no doubt but that the fame was borrowed out of the Story of Nimrod, as before remembered; and even out of this Scripture. That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, — that conceit taken from Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the Sons of the Heaven and the Earth, meaning by the Heavens the Sons of God, and by the Earth, the Daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cellam (who hath written a very witty Discourse of this Subject) thus changed into Latine:

*Nomine callosos illos dixisse Gigantes,
Orti quod terra furoris & sanguine celi.*

From th' Earth, and from thy bloud, O heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opinators, and self-believing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since, seeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superfluous training of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body, and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, That they were called Giants only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himself calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renown (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous actions. And if the same stature of body, and ability, had not been found among divers Nations after the general Flood, then might this place of Moses have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the Story of Britany) the Scriptures do clearly, and without all Allegorical construction, avow, That besides Nimrod, there were feared of the Giants in the time of Abraham, of Abraham's the Zuzai, or Zuzaimis in Hani, and the Emim which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moad; whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron: for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims. Likewise where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he useth these words: That also was taken for a Land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-time: and, whom the Amoritanes call Zanzumimis; a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaim in Affrica and Kennam, and the Zuzai or Zanzumimis, Chedorlamer King of Elam, overthrowed, slayed by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Amoritanes men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedars, and whose strength to the Oaks: and the Prophet Ezekiel, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in war. Particularly, it is written of Og King of Basjan, that his bed was of Iron was nine Cubits long, and four Cubits broad: for only Og King of Basjan remained of the remnant of the Giants who commanded the Kingdom of Basjan four hundred years after the Expedition of Chedorlamer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Ironis (sent by Moses from Cadababim in Paran) made report at their return of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the Sons of Anak, in these words: All people which we saw in it, are men of great stature: for there we saw Nam, Giants, the Sons of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that they seemed in our fight, like Goliaths, and so we were in their fight, (that is) the Searchers found in their own judgments a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themselves: inasmuch that the Israhelites were so stricken with fear, as they rather fought, and desired, to return again into Egypt, and were not willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearful Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of six Cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore, weighed five thousand shekels of Brass: the shaft of his spear was like a Weaver's beam, and his spear head weighed six hundred shekels of Iron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath, surnamed Gethu, because he was of Gath, and of these other Giants; of which the first was slain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, even four and twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after slew thirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Ass: And lastly, he took the Gates of Azubah, and the two poles, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Eben. If then it be approved by every judgment, that both Nature, and the Heavens was old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it self) infected and almost worn out the virtue of all things, then I say, That asin all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautiful, than it did in after ages: so also these Giants, those mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of men in general, soon after the Flood, and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born, in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth Age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newness of the World.

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God thought by the Flood, gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God rewarded him that he had made man: which Saint Augustine thus expoundeth; Natus enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui prout, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiariter infusa omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & pervertat superbie, & exciet negligentes, & exerceat querentes, & alii intelligentes, God (with he) dash not repeat him of any thing which he hath done, (as men use to do) but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) infuse it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrify the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World; and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

SECT. I.

That in old Corruptions, we may find some signs of more ancient Truth.

HERE, before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider how the Greeks, and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical fence, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof, and have hoped, that after ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixed Discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolen out of the Books of God. But as a skillful and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpful Medicines out of poison, as poison out of the most healthful Herbs and Plants (all things having in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those that seek after God and Truth, find out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively express.

For as the Children of Shem did inherit the Virtues of Set, Enoch, and Noah, so the Son of Cham did possess the vices of the Sons of Cain and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began, soon after the Flood, to ascribe Divine power and honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phoenicians did not only learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several Gods and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Heraclitus saith, Dundecim Deorum Nomen, id est nomina primi Aegyptii in usu habuisse, atque Graeci ab Aegyptiis illis cepisse mutatur, esseque prius Aera, & Insuper, & Tempa Diis, sibi creasse; The Egyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples, for the gods.

SECT. III.

That in process of time, these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the grofs Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BUT as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travel towards their eternal perdition: so did these grofs and Blind Idolaters, every Age after other, descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortal men only, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Air, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Mind, to Paleness, Sickness, Sorrows, yea, to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodus Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

SECT. IV.

That from the Relicks of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubal-Cain, &c.

BUT in so great a confusion of Vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these Inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient Pattern they erected their Building; were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some Inscriptions upon Stone or Metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the Son of Cham, who had learned the name of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: For, all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be falsed: and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which St. Augustine out of Varro, Eusebius out of many profane Histories; Cicero, Diadema Stellas, Arnobius & many more have observed to write; Phenicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations, yet was Cain, the Son of Adam, (as some very Learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturn: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochites, before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protogoras, which also Hymnus in his 275 Chapter confirmeth.

For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men: Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo love adificatam; yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East-side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochites were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polo- cus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an Inco-ler or Strengtheners of Cities) by Phornutus and Pan-sanius; and that to Jupiter Herceios, there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected.

And, that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that, soon after Mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plain terms in his third Book of Laws: for he saith, That Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethiacks was then the same Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Sesephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And besides this City of Henoch, Philo Ju-denus conceiveth that Cain built fix others, as Maich, Torid, Telo, Jesfa, Selet, and Gebat; but where Philo had this, I know not. Now, as Cain was the first Jupiter, & from whom also the Ethiacks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal, and Tubal-Cain (Inventors of Pastorage, Smith-craft, and Musick)
the same which were called by the Ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollus. And as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan:
so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema, or Nasmath, the Sister of Tubal-Cain, to signifie Venus, or beautiful, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the Wife of Vulcan, is said to be Venus the Lady of pleasure & beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturn; Cain, the eldest Jupiter; Eva, Rhea, and Noema, or Nasmath, the first Venus: So did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren, the Sons of Saturn, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren, the Sons of Noah: So also was the fiction of those golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Eva: So was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Prophecies, that Christ should break the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and defending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: So out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Hermes (the Inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars and heavenly Signes, and (withal) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astrea: of which Orus,

Ultima caelestium terras Astrea reliquit.

Astrea last of heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethiacks would understand Justice it self to have failed, as it is a virtue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Lust by Venus; so do they also the persons of men by like Virtues and Vices: and therefore by Justice and Astrea, Enoch; the Justice and Piety of Enoch, being in the same manner express'd, as that of Noah was by Moses: for Noah was said to be a just man: And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written,
That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

From this Story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembereth the Giants begotten by the Sons of good men upon the Daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty men, and men of renown) did they steal those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and again, their War undertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Augustine termeth him. Which War of their Giants, Cornelius Severus thus describeth:

Tentaverit (nisi) olim devorare mundo Sydera, captivum Jovis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & villo leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand
Against the Stars, to thrust them headlong down;
And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown,
On conquer'd Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second Flood, but that by this building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it self. Also the making of Leagues, Peace and Covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneid hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who, when he read the Book of the Covenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

We find also many remembrances of Seib, the paternal Ancestor of Honch and Nab, for Amemphis the same King of Egypt which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the Children of Israel (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his Son and Successeur Seib, of Seib: and of Seib (as many men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seibes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seib most manifestly preserved, that the Egyptians worshipped Seib, as their most ancient Parent, and of the first Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Seibetia. We also find in Bithynia the City of Seibia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kind of Theologie; though they scorned to acknowledg any antiquity preceding their own: and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same names to their own Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

SECT. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters, and the strange Story of the third.

BUT of all those Armies of Jupiters, remembered by the Antients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers have also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Jupiter, the Son of Acther and Dier, so called, because the one had reference to his Celestial conditions (for ether is as much as shining or pure fire;) the other discovered his natural virtues, which days and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of mens actions.

The second was said to be the Son of Calam or Heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Aibent.

The third, of whom all the Grecian Fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candia), the Son of Saturn and Opis. The name derived from the Latine is taken out of Jovans pater, from the Greek word Zeus; it signifieth life, but somewhat strained. Boetius in his Genealogy of the Gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had such a name before the time was given to men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving and faithful, (that is) giving these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter: but howsoever they were, or were not with those virtues enriched, yet by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Surnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world (howsoever deferred) as the worthiest that ever were, acquired by their well-deservings. Titus omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, The Antients called all Kings Jupiters, as Tacitus in his varia historia confirmeth; Reges olim Joves vocarunt omnes, In old times all Nations call'd their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembered Jupiter was born, it is uncertain. Some there are, that make him of Crete: others, that he was but sent thither by his Mother Opis, or Opis, to Nat. Com. be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: because it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own life) by Titan's permission, he should put to death all his male Children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any one of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturn performed in his first-born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own children. Heretofore Lycophron, thus turned into Latine:

*Haud sit pinguior,
Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filius.*

Saturn to be the father is not known,
By being the grave and burial of his own.

This composition between Titan and Saturn, Sybill also witnesseth in these words;

*Conceptis verbis, Titan jurare coegit Saturnum, de se natum ne nutriat ullum,
Quod possint regnare, senis post fata, Nepotes.*

Things thus agreed; Titan made Saturn swear
No Son to nourish, which by reigning might Usurp the right of Titan's lawful heir.

But Opis the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (first called Lysanias) into Crete, as she did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnosus, the chief City of that Island by Cressa the King, or by the Curretes, a People and Nation thereof.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes and a Theban: others call him an Arcadian; others make him of Messina. The like contention is found among the Greeks touching his education and first fostering. Some affirm that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their black coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a God; others, that he was nourished by Bears: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greeks have many pretty tales. But in the end, when Titan had knowledge that Saturn had broken his faith, he let on him, and took him and his wife prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the less powerful, fled into Italy, and left his Kingdom in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many virtues, the name of Jupiter was given him: yet after he was once fettered, and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to pallardize and adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by him as do ascribe the Actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the sin of Sodom with Ganimedes and others: and did not only begin with incest, marrying his own Sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful women born in his time, within the limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame; Niohe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the Wife of Amphytrion; by whom he had Peleagus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Targete he had Targeteus, of whom the Mountain Targete took name; with another Son called Saon, of whom Saonias; by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Cassio and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra; by Danae, Perseus; by Jordana, Deucalion; by Charon (the daughter of Eubolus) Briemarin; by Protagene, he had Didorus the Father of Eudymion; and by yo (the daughter of Isachus) Epaphus, the founder of Mempbis in Egypt: which Epaphus, married Lybia, of whom that Country took name, for to the Greeks afterward called Africa. He ravished Aegina the Daughter of Alopus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenopia, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aeneas; by Torribia he had Archeptus and Carbus; by Ora, Calceus; he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanius, afterward Troy or Troy. He begat the Brothers Talies, on Thalia, and on Garamantis, Heacbus. He had besides these (if they be not their chief god) Phileus and Pilemnus, inventors of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be Father to all these, who were born in Ages so far differing. And of these his several ravishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens Wives, Daughters, and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into showers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Grecian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monster Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Book de natura Deorum affirm, that he deserved nothing less; and in his Oration, pro domitia, reproacheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Jupiter. His burial was in Crete (saith Lucian). Crete is not solum natum apud se, & sepulchrum invenisse, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Crete, or Candian, do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they show his Grave and Sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth; for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Jupiter. This, Callimachus in his Hymns also witnesseth; but, as offended thereat, faith thus:

The Creteans ever liars were, they care not what they say:

For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'st away.

Didorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as he faith) by some Greek Writers, that the original of these gods was from the Western parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantide reigned one Uranus (which signifieth Heaven) called so, for his great skill in Astrology; and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives Forty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Tites, he had Seventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers name, the Titanes. Of Tites, likewise it is said, that the for her goodness was Canonized as a Goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was styled Heaven. But of all the Children of Tites, her Daughter Befilia (which name founding as Queen in English, she is by the Latine Translator of Didorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in virtue as in years, was by general consent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Father's death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardsness of these children moved her Brethren to envy, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Pot. The loss of this child, caused his sister to break her own neck; and the loss of both her children, made the Mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, about the isle as if she had vanquished away. Here she died, her Son (as the Fable hath signified unto her in a Dream, that he and his sister, by the providence of God, should become immortal; that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their names, and that their death should be revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withal held her self as a goddess; and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly given to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sons of Uranus divided the Kingdom. Of these, Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his name; a Just and Wise Prince, deeply skill'd in Astrology; and, for invention of the Spheres, said to have supported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was said to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill, in the midst of his contemplations; and his name, in honour of him, imposed by the people upon the morning Star. The seven Daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in quality to those that begot them. Of these it is held, that the Seven Stars called Pleiades, took name. Saturn, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africa, and Italy. Jupiter, another of the Sons of Uranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten Sons, which he called Curetes: he called that Island after his Wives name, Idea; in which Isle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Lybians were true. Saturn (as these Lybians tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His sister Rhea was married to Flammion, who reigned in some part of Africa. Flammion loving others as well as his wife, or better, got a Daughter called Minerva, near to

to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He also begot on Anallibia, a Son, called Bacchus, whom he cauled secretly, for fear of his life, to be brought up at Nysa, and Island in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva, and certain Nymphs. To Anallibia he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in form like a Horn, whence grew the tale of Anallibia's plentiful Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these news, she fled from her Husband to her brother Saturn, who, not only entertained her as a sister, but took with him to wife, and at her instigation, made war upon Flammion, vanquished him by the assistance of the Titan, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's children before mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Flammion, after the name of Crete the Kings Daughter, whom he took to wife, and had with her (women, as may seem, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting of Trees, and many things else commodious for man-kind, before the flight of his Mother-in-law. Now therefore, hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titan; he leaved an Army, to which the Amazons, living not far from Nysa, added great forces, in love of Minerva, who was entered into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, and overthrew him, and taking many of the Titan prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaved himself so well, that he won the love of all the people by whom he passed; in so much, that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous Government, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Flammion, he won a battel of Saturn before the very walls. After which, Saturn, with his Wife Rhea, fled by night, setting the Town on fire, to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entertained. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child Bacchus took with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East-Countries; and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governour of the Country; but appointed unto him as an Over-seeer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilst Bacchus travelled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titan had found out his father Flammion in Crete, and began to war upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held gods, joining all their forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titan, chased them, and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Flammion and Bacchus were dead, they were Deified; and the great Jupiter, the Son of Saturn, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the World, having none of the Titan left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between the tale of the Libyan gods, and many things else of Ofiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the Expeditions of Ofiris and of Bacchus; the wars of the Giants in the one Story, of the Titan in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Befilia, with many pretty circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniata (as English cites him) would have all these to be Phenicians, and is earnest in saying, that it is a true Story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more allegorical, by giving to Uranus or heaven for daughters, Fate, and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Didorus, though Didorus have enough. To the Genealogie, he adds Elius, or the Sun, as father of Uranus, and among the children of Uranus, Jupiter, Beilith, and Dagon (whom Didorus doth not mention by their names) giving withal to Uranus, the proper name of Terranus, or Indigena, and of Ilus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete.

The first of all is God, and the time last is he;
God is the head and middle, yea from him all things be.

God is the base of Earth, and of the starred Sky,
He is the Male and Female too, hath never die.

The Spirit of all is God, the Sun and Moon, and what is higher.

The King th' original of all, of all the end.

For close in holy breast he did all comprehend, Whence all the blessed light, his wondrous power did find.

Now (because these former testimonies) that all the Learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Grecians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Readers to those large and learned Collections of Joſeph Martyr, Clement, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eusebius, Pater, Plessier, Dureau, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and Properties: Bonus, iustus, sapiens, scilicet possidens, nihil, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodatus, immens, gloriosus, charitas, &c. God, just, only, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, always doing good, just without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, That God who beheld all things, and pierced every Nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus: He is the only King of kings: And with Virgilus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singula diversis secundum merita prebet: One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best Artificer, who giveth to every thing diverse proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Aristotle) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known; Nisi in patria illa perennet, cuius imaginem nullum habes: Save only in that everlasting Country, whose image thou hast none at all. Herodotus also Xenophanes Celophrontes: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally nor mentally like unto mortals. And Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potestque, quod omnibus patet: quali autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsis soli. qui luce sua omnia perstruat; God who shaketh all things, and sheweth all things at rest, it great and mighty, as it manifest to all: but of what form he is, it is manifest to none. Save only to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum generis, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, eternus animantium spiritus, officium mundi sui optime, sine propagatione genitor, regne luce, neque tempore nio comprehensio, eoque pauci cogitabili, nemini estis: God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the Soul, the eternal preserver of living Creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any preparation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time, therefore he can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by Saint Hieron, Si cum cunctis Philosophorum rebus libris, necesse est ut in eis reperiamus partem non formam Dei sui, apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Leonem, Statorum Principem, inventum & immortalis animas, &c. If thou consider all the Books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the World: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgment; never any man, whose mind the Art of Education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are fober, and by a positive inspection satisfied; but that he hath found by an unresistible necessity, one true God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expressed, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by devilish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best forning (as the Devil perwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common people.

SECT. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is except into every man's chimney, which the lack of Fuel harveth, Water quenched, and want of Air suffocated: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's jealousies: Death hath perwaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and durtful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth, nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Lybia, Grece, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollo's Priests are become speechless; and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and concurring Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his overthrows and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pirates: Secondly, condly, by the Plegians utterly sack'd: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captains of the Phœnians: Sixthly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoil of, despoiling as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was again gloriously re-built, and to remained till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the success of his Paganish enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten down, and lost in the Earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julian's time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an Earthquake, and many Thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the Ruines, and others slain and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the Province of Judæa, being by Julian bailed in the re-edifying of that Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing near the foundation, and of confusing the Workmen, made the Enterprise frustrate.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

SECT. I.

Of God's fore-warning: and some humane Testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

OF this destruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Decedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: he departed with his children, and travelled into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all sorts of inhuman and unnatural wickedness, and that they were contemptuous & religious: & doctum, contempters of Religion and of the gods: Among which mighty men (saith Eusebius) was erat qui deorum venerantur, & grandioris tunc, hinc nomen erat Noah: There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three Sons, Sem, Japhetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the wife of Noah, (namely Tira the Great, Pandora, Noela, and Noela) perceived themselves in the Ark. This Ark God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, Make thee an Ark, & shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and as the Guts invaded that Province, in the year 1156.

SECT. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been foreseen by the Stars.

Now, however all these Floods, and many other, which have covered at several times, several Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southwestern people) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that universal Flood (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especial commandment of God himself, who at that time gave strength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever union, could perform, without receiving from the Fountain of all power, strength and faculties supernatural. Henricus Mechtinensis, a Scholar of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Alma Mater, observeth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like Conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn happened in the last degree of Cancer; that conflagration, since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a watry Sign, and the House of the Moon, which is the Lady of the Sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of Astronomy, and common experience. And this opinion Peirus de Aliaco upon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, That although Noah did well know this Flood by divine revelation, (yet this conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second cause thereof: for those were not only signs, but also working causes, by strength receiv'd from the first cause, which is God himself. And further, that by Cataractæ Calis, signified the Windows of Heaven Myser meant this great and watry Conjunction; the word Cataractæ, signifying flowing down, or coming down. Now (both P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordain by the course of the Heavens such a Conflagration, by which all men might be hild therein their destruction towards, and therefore forsoke those wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for mercy.

Of this judgment was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood, that the words Cataractæ Calis, or Windows of Heaven, were to be taken for the former Conjunction, or for those watry signs, Cancer, Pisces, Pleides, Hyades and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His own words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetiam Hebraicam Cataractas Calis vocasse, nisi partes illas cali, que generative sunt pluviarum & inundationum sunt Aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. alio modo. At yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meant by those words (Cataractæ Calis, or Windows of Heaven) unless he thereby understood those celestial powers, by whose influences are ingendered the rain and inundations of waters, which are the watry signs of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable wisdom this Conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) add vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of virtus, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountains, commanding them to exit out the whole treasure and heap of their waters; taking retention from the clouds, and condensing ay into water by the ministry of his Angels, or whoever else best pleased his All-powerfulness.

SECT. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universal Flood: And what are Cataractæ Calis, Gen. 7. v. 11.

Now, if it be objected, That God doth not create any thing of new; (for God refted the seventh day; that is, he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seem that then all the Earth and Ay had not waters sufficient to cover the habitable World fifteen Cubits above the highest Mountains. Of this Proposition, whether God had so refrained himself, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent, (which is) that the World had want of Water to overcover the highest Mountains. I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish: for it is written, That the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, (that is) the waters forsook the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoever was dispersed therein, pierced, and brake through the face thereof. Then let us consider, that the Earth had above one and twenty thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seven thousand miles, and then from the Superficies to the Center, were three thousand five hundred miles. Take then the highest mountain of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the mountains of Armenia, or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tennessy, and I do not find, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deep, should not well help to cover the space of thirty miles in height; this thirty miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteen times: for, the Fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ay over and above it, we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ay, as every where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Ay into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seem strange to men of judgment, yea, but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (God so pleading) was covered over with Waters, without any new Creation.

Laffly, For the opinions of Conzelmus Parisiensis, and Aliaensis, to which I may add Berosus, and others, That such a conjunction there was fore-seeing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ Calis, or Windows of Heaven, was meant this conjunction; there needs no other answer than that observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth, That by the gravell Alloglossum it was observed, that in the year 1524, there should happen the like conjunction as at Noah's Flood; than which (saith he) there was never never a more fair, dry, and favourable year: The like destruction was prophesied, of the year 1588. But Picus of Mirandula proveth, that there could not be any such conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mystic in the word Cataractæ Calis, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Myser using the word Windows of Heaven (if that be the fence of the word) to express the violence of the Rains, and pouring down of Waters. For whatsoever hath seen those fallings of Water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts, (where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a restless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Myser did: That the Windows, or Flood-gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That Waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural. God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost air, and the Waters fell in abundance: Bibbald (says Job) be withheld the Waters, and they dry up; (or better in Latin, Et aquas fecantur; And all things are dried up) but when he loosed them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26 Chapter: He bindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Beasts God looked at that time of the general Flood, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep; and the joyning together, covered the Earth, till they performed the work of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their dark and vault Caves; and the reit (by a Wind) varied again into air, formerly condensed into drops.

SECT. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

Noah, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entered the Ark which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every Creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth Quietness: after others, and according to the Prophecies of his Father Lamech, Cessation; to whom afterwards gave many Names, answering his Antiquity, Zeal, Virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Oyger, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges, there was also a great Flood of Achaia; Saturn there was also a great Flood of the Father of Nations: others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiter fire: Fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus (id est) Vincis, because Janus signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libri Ritualibus, in the Book of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturn, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this Name Janus is taken from the Hebrew and Syriac, and not from the Latine Nation, or any Kingdom by that Name known. Of the antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimony: Janus erat nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pellentibus nondum bellorum regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Feri primis populis docuit Janus ad sacrificia: primus enim Arat & Pomaria & Sacra docuit; In the time of Janus (saith he) there was no Monarchy: for the desire of rule had not then folded it self about the hearts of men. Janus first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meat: he first jet up Altars, signified Gardens, and solitary Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among all the Heathen, which in all agrees so well with the Scriptures. For hith, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that took on him sovereign Authority. Secondly, Noah, after the Flood, was the first that planted the Vine, and became an Husband-man; and therefore offered of the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meal. Thirdly, he was the first that raised an Altar, and offered sacrifices: God a thanksgiving for his merciful goodness toward him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia praeferat novitatem, & futura prospexit, saith Arnobius: Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the pecton of Janus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The seed of the World: because, as out of that confused heap was drawn all the kinds of Beasts and Plants; so from Noah came all Mankind. Whercof Ovid in the pecton of Janus:

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant: Affice quia longi temporis astra cano!

The Antients call'd me Chaos: my great years By thole old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intitled Caelum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Apollodorus follow, but because he was the restorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greeks called Liber Janus and his Nurses Hyades, of Rain, because Noah entered the Ark when the Sun joynd with the Stars Hyades, a conflagration in the Bow or Neck of Taurus; & ever after a Monument of Noah's Flood. He was also by others surnamed Trinus, a Marine god, the Son of Neptunus; because he lived in safety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Dionysus, Phrygiæ, Eleusis, mentem pinguetis, l. 9. v. 19.

Bacchus, or Wine-god; though Dionysus conceived otherwise, and denoted that Name a Patre & Leos; Of his Father and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Nysa, a Town of Arabia felix, Calais, faith Suidas, out of Orpheus. He had also the title name of Taurus, or Taurapagus; because he brought yoked Oxen, and Tilled the ground: according to that of Myser; and Noah became an Husbandman. Now howsoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, (otherwise Dionysus) it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more antiently Bacrus, was taken (saith Gul. Suidas, and Strabo in out him Dionius) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of mundi Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all thole ant.

his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysus, of the Mountain Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came; whatsoever themselves give his enterprises; and thole Mountains of Nysa joyne with thole of Paropamisus, and thole other Eastern Mountains.

dible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54 foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's body, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth, and three of height) reached the length of 27 foot upright, and to most their Priests have ascended by ladders or to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to God's Commandment, given in these words: Thou shalt not go up with steps into mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the Ordinary Cubit of one foot and an half, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubleless) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be also probable, that as the men were, so were the Horses wherewith they rode, and all other Creatures of a correspondent size. And yet, (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whiter the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preferred in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the days of Noah, might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of Creatures to be saved, (that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean, with necessary food) might have place in the Ark, Burke hath very learnedly declared: the brief sum of whole discourse to that purpose, is this: The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the product by the height of thirty Cubits, sheweth the whole Capacity to have been 450000. Now, whereas the polls, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cubical Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89 distinct Species of Beasts, (or (left any should be omitted) for 100 several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them; and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the reit may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beeves, one Lion to two Wolves, and so of the reit. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number only three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entered into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odd one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as ninety one Beeves; yet for a supplement (left perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as an hundred and twenty Beeves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable, with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threecore and four Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabins; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his Family, and all their necessities.

SECT. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies, and Scythia.

§ I.

A Proposition of some Questions left material: with a Note of the use of this Question to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute; but he received the Commandment from God an hundred years before the Waters fell, and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, Saint Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversy: or, whether those Creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alligators) the Sea-Cows, or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-Pool might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hier his Ship of Synance. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfy myself and others in, is, in what part of the World the Ark rested after the Flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the Terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do only and truly reach the World's Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

§ II.

A Proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first first settlement and plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led to think out of any Humour, or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the original and first truth, which is the Word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, That the Ark rested upon one of the Mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Targum hath converted Kardu, meaning the Hills Gordae, or Gordie, in Armenia the greater, (as the words Gordae, and Kardu, seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are: I find neither Scripture nor Reason which teacheth any such thing (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolas Damascenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Barris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Friar Arinus (citing this place out of Josephus) makes him find another adjoining, called Oetla, and to say that the Ark (of which Moses the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Oetla. But I do not find any such Mountain in being, as this Oetla, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Josephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontory in Asia Felix of that name; and Pliny finds a Mart-Town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Oetla, Petrus Aegla, and Niger Zidon. But this Oetla of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains, Berosus calls those Mountains of Ararat, Gordie; and Curtius, Gordae; Ptolemy, Gordae and Gordie; of which the Country next adjoining is, by this Nicolas Damascenus, called Nymada, perhaps (as Beatus conjectures) for Milyada, or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seems to be compounded of this word Minni and Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Pliny witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Caryder about these Mountains, whom others call Gordani or Gordeni. The Mountains are rated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates, in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Thospis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75 degrees of longitude, and 41 & 52 degrees of latitude. One of the Mountains, Gordie, (that which furnormeth the reit) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Josephus. Which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noah's coming down with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event: seeing any Hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Josephus Antiquities (Kubaris). That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Joseph, l. i. c. 4. says, the place is called Anticartaeus, (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphanius lib. i. cont. Hares: calls it Asop, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian Tongue signifieth Descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whence of also the Latine Delubrum may seem to be derived, and Alti 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that Mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair up and down unto it, than to any of the reit adjoining.

§ III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many Arguments to persuade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest it self in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Barris, nor any one of the Gordian Mountains.

For the first: It is agreed by all who follow Berosus, that it was in the year 130, or in the year 131. after the Flood, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward call'd Babylonia, Chus, and Chaldeae. If then the Ark had first found Land in Armenia, it is very improbable, that the Children of Noah, which came into that Valley, could have spent so many years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was only intercurrent, which might by easy Journeys have been pass'd over in twenty days; and to hasten and help which passage, the Navigable River of Tygris offered it self, which is every where transpassible by Boats of great burthen: so as where the Defart on the one side redified their expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self: Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod did doubt the surprize of a second Flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it foundeth ill to the ear of reason, that they would have spent many years in that low and over-blown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the effects witnesseth their afflictions; and the works which they undertook, their unbelief: being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to provide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared Inundation. Now, at Babel it was, that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World, founded after the Flood, about 131. years, or (as others suppose) ten years later: though (for my self) I rather think that they undertook that work in two respects: First, to make themselves famous, To get us a name (saith the Text: Gen. 10. 12) Secondly, thereby to usurp Dominion over the reit.

§ IV.

The second Argument; That the Eastern People were most ancient in poplosity, and in all humane glory.

FOR a second Argument: The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing, and Artillery (among many other things which in East had) may easily persuade us, that those Sun-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this report, that the East Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portuguese and others, make us now to understand, That the place of Philistrus in vita Apollonii Tiani, 1.2. c.14. is no fable, though expressed in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wife men, which dwell between Hypasus and Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into Battle: but that they drive away their Enemies with Thunder and Lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there it is said, that Hercules Aegyptum and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there call-way his golden Shield. For the invention of Letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no less anti-ent than Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembered) long before the Flood. But from the Eastern World it was that John Gutenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome; and after that Nicolaus Gersan a Frenchman, bettered both the Letters and Invention.

And notwithstanding that this Mystery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinese had Letters long before either the Egyptians or Plorentians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civil knowledge, or any Letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portuguese and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred years since discovered those Kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinese account all other nations but salvages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this argument, the conquest and story of Alex. Macedon may justly be considered to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuous in that little Kingdome of Persia, which lay side by side to the East India, than in all his other tra-vails and undertakings. For in Alexander's time, learning and greatness had not travelled so far to the West as Rome. Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-riding, and hear Paulus Frontinus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island thereof, we shall find that those Nations have lent out, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil: the farther West, the more Salvages. And of the Isle of Japan (now Zippangus) Venetus mak-eth this report: Incolae religioni, littere, & sapientia sunt additissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi:
nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) fa-vis in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philosophy, and most diligent teachers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians: They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, sumptuous buildings, and police in government, is reported to be such by those who have been employed in those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

II. V.

The third Argument, from the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies,

But for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the invasion of Semi- ramis before the indifferent and advised Reader:
who may consider in what Age she lived, and how soon after the Worlds new birth she gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more than three millions to invade India, to which he adjoyned also 500000. Horses; and 100000. Waggon: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Country after the Flood. Now as touching the time wherein she lived: All Historians consent that she was the Wife of Nimrod, and the most approved Writers agree, that Nimrod was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Ni- rod, that Nimrod was the Son of Chus, Cush, of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two defuncts cast between Ni- rod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Army was composed.
Let us then see with whom she encountered in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling her own, conducted by Stannabates King of India beyond Indus: of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod., Siculus; Staurabates castris ma- joribus, quam quae erant Semiramidis, copis: Staur- abates gathering together greater Troops than those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a Colony sent out from Shi- naar (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Stannabates may have been made of easily, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from so great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Iffat) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army Victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies lent thither had been so late as Babel, overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65. years time after the Flood, before Nimrod was born: of which, thirty years to Cash ere he begat Seba, after whom he had thirty years to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and De- dan, both which were before Nimrod: and five years to his five elder Brothers, which make fifty five, and then twice thirty years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba, and De- dan with others, to beget their Sons; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five years; there will then remain six years to have been spent in travelling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinar, in the year after the Flood 131. And to the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which

Gen. 10.7.

which make him to have arrived at Shinar in the year 101. and the Confusion to have been at Pel- egis birth, these men do all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build Nimrod's Tower in the Ayr; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require flood foundations) in the Plains of Shinar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that year 101. or at Pelgis birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regal authority in the 131. year after the Flood (according to Berosus) and that the Work of Babel lasted forty years (according to Glycon). Humanus in perforandis totis 40. annis incalsum Laborantibus: Men labouring in vain 40. years to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. years after the Flood, ere a Colony was sent into East India; which granted, (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Stannabates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperors of all that part of the World gathered the most of Nations into one body.

II. VI.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of Noah.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the World before the Flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600. years, was all that space 130. years after the Flood without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah defined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western World; (which Travails Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself, then covered with many years, planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman, whose business was to dress and manure the Earth, and not to range over to many parts of the World, as he even Armenia into Arabia Felix, where he should (if the Tradition be found) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton: then into Spain where they say he found other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Nogla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three years; but finding no amendment, they say he banished him out of Italy. There be but the fancies of Berosus Armenius, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to travel far in such a Forest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Flood; the same lay wast and over-grown for 130. or 140. years, and where in there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for Woods, Bushes, and Bryars, that in those years were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that No- ah never came into the Valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For No- ah who was Father of all those Nations, a man reverenced both for his Authority, Knowledge, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent persuasions he would have bound their hands from so vain labours, and by the authority which he received from God himself, he would have held them in that awful subjection, as whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personal commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of man-kind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up buildings against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay upon them the same, if not a more sharp affliction.

Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest part of the World to plant) under Ni- rod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus, and Calistophorus, take the testimony of Melchiodus Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increase (to wit) Ni- rod, Saphene, and Syl-Bas, of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Chus, Chus of Sem, and Sa- phene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduct.

Of the Sons of Sem: Jethan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East-India.
The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia, and the other adjoining to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Jethan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now, another reason which moves me to believe that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the Story of the Hebrews, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all man-kind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a Person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawn himself, and rested a-part with his best Beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions.
For he landed in a warm and fertile field, where he planted his Vineyard, and dressed the Earth; after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so far away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borders.

SECT. VII.

Of the senseless opinion of Annius the Commentator upon Berosus, who finds divers places where the Ark rested; as the Caspian and Gordian Hills, which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some places of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Friar Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus and others, labourerth marvelously to prove that the Ark of Noah rested upon the Armenian Mountains called Caspiis, which Mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And because all his Authors speak of the Mountains of Gordia, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting these far-distant Mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with errors, which have carefully over-seen, Printed, and Published Ptolemy's Geography, in which they are altogether differed. For that last Edition of Mercator sets these Hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient Copies of Vilamantus, and others, we shall find nothing in them to help Annius withal: for in those the Mountains Caspii stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordia, which makes 420. miles. And for those Authors by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himself, Scythia mankind was restored after the great Flood 250. years before Ninus: and in part utterly destroyed his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga; as, In Scythia Saga renatum morale genus. In Scythia Saga, mankind was restored: he therefore in the Prologue of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, bonis in Scythia salvatus. For Scythia Saga, or Sace, is undoubtedly under the Mountains of Parapamisus, on which, or near which it is most probable that the Ark first took ground: and from those East parts (according to Myler) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Sinear Gen. 11. 2. or Babylonia.

But now, the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name as Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his fallhood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulatorum Scytharum. The Scythians Fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that work, giveth this Title to that very Chapter; Scytharum origo & fides fabula. The original and fables of the Scythians, a Fable. And (indeed) there needs no great proof hereof, since Ptolemy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Sace, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians Sace; which Pliny confirms: for in respect that these Sace (saith Pliny) are the Scythians next to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. Now, that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxen in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sace; and the Country about Araxen Ptolemy calleth Caspia, and Sedone, and Sacepote, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are, or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus, or without, to the number of 100. several Nations, are by Ptolemy precisely set down.

But, to come to those latter Authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great part of those North-East Regions, and searched their Antiquities with great diligence: Fir, Marinus Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountains, is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, una propria vocatibus Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Oxiana Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Sagis, Sagdi, an, Margianis, usque ad Oxam in Hypericum mare exentis; & parte ipsius maris hinc usque ad Rha fuminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus, is that part of the World which in their own speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West-side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East, by the Imaum Mountains: on the North, by unknown Lands: on the South, by the Sacer (which are the Sace) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea to the mouth of Rha. Rha, Now Volga.

Now, if Niger lets all Sarmatia Asiatica to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que magna sunt Regio est, & que innumeras nationes comprehendit, Asia fide) which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations, saith Niger much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia

Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he differeth Sarmatia it self from a part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand bound of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Pandus Venerus, he hath not a word of Armenia; neither doth his fellow Friar Juba Flaccus (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make mention of Armenia; neither doth Haymyn, an Armenian born of the blood of those Kings (though afterwards a Monk) ever acknowledge himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he writ that story at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, find Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travels are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he bewaith that ancient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Rhiphei, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanis or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains in verum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Moscovia known to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, woody, and marshy grounds. The River of Tanis or Don, twelfth to the South of the City Tulla, some twenty English miles, out of a Lake called Imanensis, in the great Wood Odeniskitler, or Seiphanotler. Volga, which Ptolemy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Pronom, in the great Wood Vodkuzki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of SyrDhenus (now Nipper) and Djuna or Diviana. And this learned Possian doth in this fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russiani, Lithuanians, Moscovians, and those adjoining bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the Name per chance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germania and Sarmatia: and for the East-border he nameth Tanis, or Don, Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanis, and the Caspian Sea, to withhold it from stretching further East: the Asian Sarmatia being that part of Scythia which Ptolemy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imaum. And the same Matthias Michon further affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Friar Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it self above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem novam, & adventitiam a partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asie Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entered into Asia, & gat new settlements a little more than 300. years before (indeed) before that time the Goths or Goths inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was Printed at Augusta in the year 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East; for in the East it was, that the Ark of Noah rested, and the Scythians were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountains, of Taurus. And were there no other testimony than the general description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Araxes) between Jaxartus and Tanis, but what are these Scythians to any Araxes, or Scythia Araxen, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

§. VIII.

The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

To this if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, Thou Noah planted a Vineyard, Gen. 9. 20. we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rapin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Ark was supposed: for it were a stranger in Italy and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latinum: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenae and the Alpes near unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they druck the vine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof, they halted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant Fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither: as by Saturn from else-where into Italy.

Now it is manifest, that Noah travelled not far to seek out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to plant a Vine-yard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and wherefore the Ark rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travelled far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husbandman, and not a wanderer.

An answer to an Objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from whence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Sinear; doth not appear, saving that it may be inferred out of these words (from whence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them [from whence] upon all the Earth; which hath no other other fence, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were then dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybillis (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Sbinar for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum curam adificatum altissimum, quasi per eam Cælum efficeretur: Certain of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

¶ X.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

BUT before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, faith the Marginal Note of the Geneva: the Chaldee Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, faith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it self had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first late thereon.

Neither these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountains of the World, and yet it doth not follow, that the Ark found the highest Mountain of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Ark. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Books of the Sybillis it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Ark lay, said after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia and not Armenia: they are placed where the City of Colones was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Merisus, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it self with the River Meander, which is far from the Gordian Mountain in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Cæron (by others Kairon and Arnor, he called by) they are placed where the City of Colones was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Merisus, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it self with the River Meander, which is far from the Gordian Mountain in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Cæron (by others Kairon and Arnor, he called by) they are placed where the City of Colones was afterward built.

For the best Cosmographers, with other, that have seen the Mountains of Armenia find them far inferior, and under-set to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and elsewhere: as the Mountain Atlas between Macedonia and Thracia, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Idus, (faith Cassiodorus) is far surpassing any Mountain that ever hath been seen in Armenia: for it calleth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seven and thirty miles and upwards: of which Plinarch, Atlas admodum latera Lemnia vocat: Plin. Arch. Cæsa.

¶ XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

FOR the best Cosmographers, with other, that have seen the Mountains of Armenia find them far inferior, and under-set to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and elsewhere: as the Mountain Atlas between Macedonia and Thracia, which Ptolemy calls Olympus, now called Idus, (faith Cassiodorus) is far surpassing any Mountain that ever hath been seen in Armenia: for it calleth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seven and thirty miles and upwards: of which Plinarch, Atlas admodum latera Lemnia vocat: Plin. Arch. Cæsa.

that shadoweth the Cow of Lenius. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or Rain overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Antandrus in Myris, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamander floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seen from Constantinople. There are also in Armenia near the Sea, the famous Mountains of Ararat, of which Herodotus: Extat in hoc mari Mus, cui nomen Ararat, it a sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountain called Ararat, whose height is said to be such as the eye of no mortal man can discern the top thereof. And if we may believe Aristotle, then are all these inferior to Caucasus, which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height: *Caucasus Mons omnium latissimus, qui clypeus ad ortum sunt, acuminis atq. latitudine, quæ jugis à Sole radiantes usq. ad continetium ab ortu: Cæterum ab occasu Caucasus (faith Aristotle) is the greatest Mountain both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lighted by the Sun-beams (usq. ad continetium) which is faith Macrobius between the first crowing after mid-night and the break of day: Others affirm, that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valley; but I cannot believe either, for the highest Mountain of the World known, is that of Teneriffe in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Suns company at any such late hours. Besides, these Mountains which Aristotle calleth Caucasi, are those which separate Archie from Beria: though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountain, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchis from Beria: falling afterward into Exinrus: which River (it is manifest) yieldeth it self to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercurator bring it from Taryardus.*

¶ XII.

Of divers incongruities in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the Books of the Sybillis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Beria was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Ark grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia: and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in verum natura, as Beria: for Beria (faith Herodotus) significeth high Towers; and so may all high Hills be called indifferently: and therefore we may better give the name of Beria to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authors themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordias stand: for Ptolemy distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordians, and calleth those of Armenia, Melchici and Paryardus, as aforesaid. Now Paryardus is located near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West side riseth Euphrates, and of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountains Melchici are those Hills which disjoin Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

¶ XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel that the same Lege of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LASTLY, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Sbinar; or else we shall wound the Truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moser) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrænia: But as these, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in divers Countries, so all that long Ledg of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolemy both Taurus, hisidricus counter and cross the Mountains of the great Ima-Lydia. us, are of one general name, and are called the 5-6-27 Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seem to arise. So all these Mountains of Thyrana, Armenia, Cassius, Melchici, Amazonicis, Henoichi, Seychis, (thus diversly called by Pliny and others) Ptolemy calls by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountains which cut asunder America, even from the new Kingdom of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West, so do these marvellous Mountains of Imus stretch themselves North and South: and being of like extent well-near, are called by the name of Imus, even as Pliny called these former Hills Taurus, and Miser the Hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolemy, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and divide: as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Allyria, Media, Sisiana, Perfia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropansus: having all these Kingdoms, either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular Places and Regions. For these Mountains which under Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less, on the North-side, are called Taurus; and those Mountains which part it from Comagene (a Province of Syria) are called Armenia: the Mountains called Taurus, running East and West, as Iman doth North and South. Through Taurus, the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Ananias to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East-side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolemy's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Corras, though between the upper and nether Corras, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Atakada in Media they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Ovantes, and towards the East part Coronus, out of the Southern part whereof the River of Eigradus riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyracians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the Mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yielding her self to Oxus (now Amu). And rising now near their way end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropausis, and lastly, of Caucasia, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions, Hydaspis and Zare-drus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Iman of Sybia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Deluguer, and the rest Nagracus: and these Mountains in this place only are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolemy) that is, between Paropausis and Iman: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

§. XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountain Caucasi, and towards the East-Indies: and of other excellencies of the Soil.

NOW, in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nysus, (so called of Bacchus Nysus, or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the World did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Flood; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indo-Sybia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, and 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judea, Caudia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palatina, where the searchers of the Land, by Moses direction, found bunches of equal bigness at Ejof.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana, near the Mountains of Ararat, did Alexander least himself and his Army ten days together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

§. XV.

The Conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is known by the name of Ararat. But, as Pliny giveth to this Ledger of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paropausis and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrænes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them: the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions, and divers Countreys. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterrane and in-land Sea; and yet where it washeth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhennus: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia, Ægeum: between Syllas and Athens, Hellepontus: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Ægeus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Dumaledeyrum: and on this side, the Britannic Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Question, we must appeal to that Judge which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other contrifution than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the fence is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fence to our selves any new or strange exposition: And (withall) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us, touching the Gospel of Christ Jesus (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narraturibus Discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legentis, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, cognoverit: That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel) the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

The words then of Moses, which end this Dispute are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which proveth without controverſie, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinaar: and therefore the Ark of Noah reſted and took land to the East-ward thereof. For we muſt remember, that in all places whereſoever Moses maketh a difference of Countreys, he always precifely nameth toward what quarter of the World the ſame were ſeated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Jofiah, he nameth Sepphar, a Mountain in the Eaſt: where he remembreth Cains departure from the preſence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the Eaſt-side of Eden: And when he deſcribeth the Tent and Habitations of Abraham, after he departed from Sechem, he uſeth theſe words: Afterwards removing thence unto a Mountain Eaſt-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tent: having Bethel on the Weſt-side, and Hai on the Eaſt: and afterward in the ninth Verſe of the ſame Chapter, it is written: And Abraham went Eaſtward journeying towards the South: alſo when Ezechiel prophecieth of Gog and Magog, he ſheweth that theſe Nations of Togorma were of the North-quarters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, that ſhe came from the South to viſit Solomon: And the Magi, (or Wiſemen) came out of the Eaſt to offer preſents unto Chriſt. And that all Regions, and theſe travels were precifely ſet down upon the points of the Compaſs and Quarters of the World, it is moſt manifeſt: for Eden was due Eaſt from Judea: Saba South from Hieruſalem: and the way from Bethel to Egypt direſtly South; and the Caucasians, the Tubalians, and Magogians inhabited the Regions direſtly North from Palſtina, and ſo of the reſt. But Armenia answereth not to this deſcription of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the Eaſt, nor ſo near unto the Eaſt as the North: for Armenia is to the Weſt of the North it ſelf, and we muſt not ſay of Moses (whoſe hands the holy Ghoſt directed) that he knew not eaſt, and that he knew not Eaſt from Weſt. For the body of Armenia ſtandeth in forty three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in forty five: and thoſe Gordian Mountains, whereon it was ſuppoſed that the Ark reſted, ſtand in forty one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are ſituated in thirty five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between Eaſt and Weſt) the Gordian Mountains ſtand in 75. degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-weſt, 95. degrees from the Eaſt;

and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the Eaſt one whole quarter of the Compaſs. But Gregory, and Hierome warn us, In Scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debeat: nam ſinguli ſermones, ſyllabe, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena ſunt ſignificus: In the Scriptures the leaſt difference may not be omitted: for every ſyllable, ſyllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are re- plenished with their meanings. And therefore ſeeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the Eaſt, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who alſo ſpeak by hear-ſay, and by report, Ut fertur, & ut dicunt, as Berſius and Nicolaus Damſcenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lyeth Weſt from the place where the Ark of Noah reſted after the Flood: and therefore it firſt found ground of all things. The Eaſt parts were firſt known, which had Noah himſelf for an inſtrument, and direſtly Eaſt from Shinaar in the Eaſt degree of 35. are the greateſt Grapes, and the beſt Wine. The great Armenians alſo which overtopped in number thoſe Millions of Semirami, prove, that theſe parts were firſt planted. And whereas the ſame opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reaſon ſufficient: for my ſelf I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, That the Sons of Noah came out of the Eaſt into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark reſt on thoſe Eaſtern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountains of Ararat, and not on thoſe Mountains of the North-weſt, as Berſius firſt feigned, whom moſt part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I ſay, in the plentiful warm Eaſt where Noah reſted, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. *Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ ſtudium, in qua tractanda ipſe omnium peritiſſimus eſſe dicitur: ob quam rem ſua ipſius lingua Ilu-Adamath (hoc eſt) ſclarius ut appellatur celebratiſſime eſt. The ſtudy of Husbandry pleaſed Noah (ſaith the excellent learned man Armenius) in the knowledge and order of which it is ſaid that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language, a man exerciſed in the earth. Which alſo theweeth, that he was no wanderer; and that he troubled not himſelf with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but ſtayed in his defined places, and in that part of the World where he was firſt delivered out of the Piſton of the Ark, whereunto God had committed him, to preſerve him and mankind.*

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

SECT. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder then Japhet.

Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 16. c. 3.

OF these Sons of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. St. Augustine cleareth Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue: as by the examples of Henech, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controverſie; The Latine Tranſlation, and ſo the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in theſe words: Uno Shem alſo the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius, agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the ſame words in this manner: To Shem alſo the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and brother of Japhet the eldeſt Son, were children born: So the tranſpoſition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar Tranſlation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by theſe Tranſlations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwiſe different) ſeing Gods bleſſings are not tyed to fiſt and laſt in blood, but to the eldeſt in piety, yet the arguments are ſtronger for Japhet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly underſtood without any danger or inconvenience, it ſeemeth ſtrange why any man of judgement ſhould make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth year of his life, began the fiſt of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the ſix hundredth year (to wit) the hundredth year following, came the general Flood; two years after which, Shem began Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: ſo as Shem was but an hundred years old, two years after the Flood: and Noah began his fiſt born being 500. years old; and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an Hundred years old at the Flood, and in the ſix hundredth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which ſeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is alſo written: Then Noah awoke from his Wine, and knew what his younger ſon had done unto him (to wit) Ham: of neceſſity the fiſt place doth belong to Japhet. This younger ſon, ſo converted by the Vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it ſilue minimus, his youngest ſon; but St.

Gen. 11. 10.

Gen. 9. 24.

Chryſoſtom takes it otherwiſe, and finds Cham to be the middle or ſecond brother, and Japhet the youngest ſon of all: which Cham for his diſobedience and the contempt of his Father (whoſe nakedneſſe he deſided) was diſinherited, and loſt the pre-eminency of his birth, as Eſau and Ruben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in reſpect of Shem the eldeſt, but avoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, becauſe it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himſelf was alway named in the fiſt place; yet whereas in the fiſt Verſe of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet, in the ſecond Verſe Moſes leaveth to begin with the iſſue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet fiſt. So the fiſt place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty reſpect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Chriſt our Saviour were defended of him. And therefore, whether we ſhall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this conversion, Shem Frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius and Tremelius, Shem Frater Japhet the major; or with Pererius, Shem Frater Japhet the major: Inſerting that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have ſeen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldeſt. For where Pererius qualifieth the ſtrength of the former argument, That Shem's age at the time of the Flood did not agree with the eldſhip (with a ſuppoſition that the Scriptures took no account of ſmaller numbers) I do not find in the Scriptures any ſuch neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred years old, and began Arphaxad two years after the Flood; and again in the 12. Verſe: So Shem lived after he began Ebar, four hundred and three years, &c. ſo as the number of two years, of three years, of five years, and afterward of two years, were always precisely accounted.

SECT.

SECT. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yield to Moſes: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowing great Lords of the first Ages were of the iſſue of Ham.

BUT let us go unto the Worlds plantation after the Flood, which being rightly underſtood, we ſhall find that many Nations have ſuppoſed or fringed themſelves thoſe Anceſtors and Fathers, which never ſaw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch defended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the ſons and iſſues of Noah were diſtributed, and what Regions were fiſt planted by them, from whence by degrees the reſt of the World was alſo peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the ſame muſt be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For ſo far as the ſtory of Nations is therein handled, we muſt know, that both the truth and antiquity of the Books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, and teſtimony of antiquity whatſoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the ſame hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful obſervers of time have noted: among which, thus writeth Euſtbin in the Proame of his Chronology: Moſes is found more antient than all thoſe the Grecians make moſt antient, as Homer, Heſiod, and the Trojan War; and before Hercules, Muſeus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Cadmus, Pellex, Esculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the reſt of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have ſtated in the top and higheſt Tarret of their Divinity.

Cicero de Nat. Deor. l. 3.

De Civit. Dei l. 16. c. 11.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by Cicero, the antientieſt was the ſon of Aether, whoſe three ſons begotten on Proſperina, were born at Athens, of which Cecrops was the fiſt King; and in the end of Cecrops time did Moſes bring the children of Iſrael out of Egypt: Eduxit Moſes populum Dei ex Egypto novissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensis Regis; Moſes brought the Children of Iſrael out of Egypt in the laſt days of Cecrops King of the Athenians, ſaith St. Auguſtine; and yet, but Thus long after him. But becauſe the truth hereof is diversly proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut another the purpoſe in hand, by alledging many authorities in a needleſſe queſtion, but leave it to the proper place.

The Sons of Japhet were	{	Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meſhach, and Tirm.	{	The Sons of Gomer were	{ Arkenaz, Riphath, Togarma.
				The Sons of Javan were	{ Eliſha, Tarſhis, Kittim, and Dodanim.

Fiſt, we are to conſider, that the World after the Flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the Children of Noah wings to fly from Shinar to the uttermoſt border of Europe, Africa, and Asia, in haſte, but that theſe Children were directed by a wife Father, who knew thoſe parts of the World before the Flood, to which he directed his children after it, and ſent them not as diſcoverers, or ſtall-adventurers, but as ſoldiers and allotted to every Son and their iſſues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authours, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Aeneas) or elſe to glorifie their own nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themſelves, and after them, upon Reaſon and Nature. Fiſt therefore we muſt call to mind, and conſider, what manner of face the Earth every where had in the 1390. year after the great Inundation; and by comparing thoſe fruitfull Valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our ſelves thereby, what wonderful Deſerts, what impaſſable fateneſs of woods, reeds, briers, and rotten grass; what lakes and ſtanding pools, and what miſtices, ſens, and bogs, all the face of the Earth (excepting the Mountains) was pelted withall. For, if in this our Climate (where the dead and deſtroying Winter depreſſeth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one half of the year in effeſt) yet in twenty or thirty years, theſe our grounds would all over-grow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods, or with other offenſive thickets and buſhments: much more did all ſorts of plants, reeds, and trees, proſper in the moſt fruitful Valleys, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withall, the ſtate of 1390. years to raiſe themſelves without controulement.

This being conſidered, it will appear, that all theſe people which came into Shinar, and over whom Nimrod, either by order or ſtrength, took the Dominion, did, after the conſuſion of Languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty People, diſperſe themſelves into the Regions adjoining to the ſaid Valley of Shinar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babilonia, and Chaldaea: and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, ſome of them towards the South, others towards the Weſt and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both Eaſt and Weſt from Shinar, with the Dominion of Paleſtina, which the Canaanites fiſt poſſeſſed; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his Inheritance on the ſudden, but by time and degrees. For we find that Abraham, the true ſucceſſor of Shem, dwelt in Chaldaea, at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he reſted at Charan in Meſopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare he travelled to Siechem in Paleſtina; and yet there had paſſed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themſelves) ſeven Deſcents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldaea; where, and in Babilonia, all thoſe people, by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Aſſyria, and founded Nineweh. Indeed, the great Matters of Nations (as far as we can know) were in that Age in the iſſues of Ham; the bleſſing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking eſſeſt, until divers years were conſumed; and until the time arrived, which by the wiſdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babilonia, Syria, and Egypt for many Deſcents together.

SECT.

would not have been dead for so many hundred years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countreys far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is joyed both Nations, Reason, Politic, and Necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

SECT. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Meshech, seated first about Asia the left; out of Ezekiel, Chap. 38. 39.

Now, although many learned and reverend men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arian Montanus, was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josaphus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors, so was he in the Plantation of the World very gross and fabulous; whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his testimonies for current, have been by him far misled. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gog the Son of Japhet possessed, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures takes most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names have troubled many Commentators, faith Atenst, Boraldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezekiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togermians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince, or chief Conductor, in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Japhet Issues possit, all Asia the Left was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Japhet (whom Ezekiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependency upon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 27. Chapter Ezekiel prophesieth of the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Israel and Juda, after their delivery from Captivity.

By which Prophecie of Ezekiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written: And David my servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one Shepherd, (that is) they shall be united as they were in David time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter, Ezekiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Union, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to grace, and promised to restore. And in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their return, and sought to subvert them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Calosyrians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of

man, sit thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chief Prince of Meshech (or Mesch) and Tubal: and afterward, Behold, I come against the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth Verse, Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezekiel having first delivered the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanity assay Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (with Saint Hieron) vicinum or covering of a house: and Pontus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (with he) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum, sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane form. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (m) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of, or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pontus: at least in this not anath, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which agreeeth this observation of Boraldus, Magog (with he) in Hebrew is written Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (he) which is used but for an Empire (which the Hebrews call Heliachia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech (or Mesch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Selenus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seek to make the Jews their Tributaries only, but endeavour'd by all means, and by all kind of violence, to extinguish the Religion it self (which the Hebrews profess'd) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. S. Ambrose, and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: because, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Melius derives the Turks from the Seythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a man: others, of a Region, other for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who says that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greek Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygen Lake, which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia (of which Strabo, who says that Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Ph. 13. nie calleth it Gygenum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicanor let it about the Rivers of Hilias, and Mander: but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who, after he had subdued the Country about the River Rhadinus which runneth into the Hellaspont, called the Promontory Tropeus after his own name Gyges. These Opinions do also seem to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, faith he, is that part of Asia the left, which Helixet obtained, and after him his Son Cresus; who (as Junius further notes) having mastered all those Regions as far South as Lithouria, in that Border built the City Gigarta, or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the City of Gog) seated in Calosyria, whose People were the ancient Enemies of the Jews.

Now, that Magog is found in Calosyria, Pliny affirmeth, saying: Calosyria habet Bambycem, que alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur: Syria vero, Magog; Calosyria habet in it Bambyce, quib in another name is called Hieropolis; but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us, that the monstrous Idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Dereto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying, That the City had anciently another name, which he yet expresth not; forbearing, perhaps, the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the words. But if we may believe Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia, the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idol was worshipped. Orellius is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce, or Hierapolis. It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Selenus.

Now, I do not condemn the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josaphus, but grant that, perhaps, Magog might also be the Father of the Seythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made Prince of Magog, the Nations of Calosyria, and the North parts adjoining be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might be propagated into Sybia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Seythians in old times coming out of the North-east, waited the better part of Asia the left, and possessed Calosyria, where they built both Seythopolis and Hierapolis, where the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezekiel had reference, it is very plain: for this City Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judea, according to the words of Ezekiel, that from the North-quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successors of Selenus, the Successors of Alexander Macedon. Cassiodorus Tyrinus thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Story of Tubal. Pliny takes it to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that of Euphrates; but another of the same name: now, the known name is Alepepe: for so Belonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This City had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred City, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idol of the Mermaid Atergatis, or Atergatis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Dereto.

If then we confer the words of Ezekiel in the third Verse of the thirty eighth Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withall remember that Hierapolis was the City of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judea: with whom also Ezekiel coupleth Gomer, and all his Bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Calosyria; and therefore that the Opinions of Boralius, Josaphus, and wholesoever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josaphus refer himself to latter times, and think that some Colonies of the Tubalines might from Beria and Asia pass into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengedia) and Albania, (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time the people might from their first habitation, pass into the Countreys near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Josaphus makes mention of the Ileri, saying, that they were anciently called Tubelot, as of Tubal, from whence (with Justine) they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that Region: having been like underground that it was a Southerly Country, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalyber, lived altogether by the Exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in the following Verses, telling how the Argonauts did visit them:

*Hec gens tellurem rigido non verit aratro,
Sed ferri vena standis sub montibus alis:
Mercurius hac mutat, que vita alimento ministrans.*

The Chalyber plough not their barren Soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toil
For Merchandize, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-peopel it anew. This appeareth by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawn to pass over the Streight into that Country: and after by the Athens who held Granado, and the South parts, eight hundred years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth year of Nimrod's Reign, Tubal pass into Spain, and therein built Saint Vreal: a poor Town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we must find Meshech or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezekiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their assistants. And that Meshech inhabited Asia, Pandinus (though he followed Boralius) confesseth, for these be his words: Mesicus, qui a Moise Mesch, priscus Aegypti ab Adula monte usque ad Ponticum regionem posui: hac regione Cappadocia distat, in qua ubi Mazica, &c. hinc terra Magog principalis. Mesicus, whom Moses calleth Meshech, placed the ancient Mesians from the Mount Adula, unto the Coasts of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mazica, &c. this is the principal Country of Magog. And this doth Annus also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Meshech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and not North from Judea. Also Ezekiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Meshech and Tubal jointly. And for a third proof, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far soever stretched) Ezekiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horfemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude, and a mighty. Then, if any man believe that these troops came out of Spain over the the Pyrene, and first passed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued again about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is half the length or compass of the then known World; he may be called a strong Believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary, it is known that Selenus was a Province neighbouring Palästina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magag) joynted unto it: whose Parents commanded all Syria, and Asia the less, (namely, the Selenudica) and held it, till Scipio Africanus overthrew Antiochus the Great: after which yet they possess Syria, till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech bein Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himself with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the less; and in long tract of time his valliant Illue filled all Germany, reigned long in France and Britany, and possessed the utmost borders of the Earth, accomplishing (as Melanchthon well notes) the figination of their Parents name, which is Umsit bordering. But when these borders wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the Nations occupying the Countreys, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Reformer of our Antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers: necessity inflicting them to spoil their Neighbours, to whom in their original, they were as near joynted, as afterwards in the feats which they possessed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authority of Cæsar affirming it, is proof sufficient. But in times following, they pursued richer Conquests, and more easily, though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawn at length into Asia the less, and occupied those parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitors. I say not that they claimed those Lands as theirs by Descent, for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now, concerning Samobes, for his excellent wisdom, firamed Dial, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japheths Sons) they must find him in some old Poet: For Fanclius, a great Berselius, confesseth: Quis hic Samoches fuerit incertum est: Who this Samoches was, it is uncertain, neither is there any proof that he was that same Dial, whom Cæsar saith the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confesseth with Fanclius: Maye on ne sçay qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

SECT. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

But before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it is necessary to disprove the Fiction which Annius hath of Noah himself: an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath writteth) by those Authors of whom himself hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lavinus and others. For Annius feels to perfwade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the fame which followed Genos, with other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92. years. This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For, if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Edi, Babel, Erec, Achad, Chabne and Nineve, by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. years. But it were a needles labour for me to disprove the authority of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that Tartianus the Assyrian, in his Oration against the Greeks, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Books dedicated to Antiochus the Successor of Selencus Nicator: but Annius hath devised five Books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the busines of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Laitines (before Jesus) consumed but 150. years: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Jesus arrival into Italy, there past 1226. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codemian) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Rosa in the world's year (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah died 350. years after the Flood: and so there past between Janus of Italy, and Noah surnamed Janus, 704. years. For Saturius succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturius, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latinus lived at once with Tamianus the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelagius of Poloponnesus; with Demophon of Athens; and Samphon Judge of Israel. Now, all these five Kings of the Laitines having consumed but one hundred and fifty years, and the last of them in the time of Samphon: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty years, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Iun the Son of Xanthus, the Son of Deucalion, from whom they drew the Ionex, who were indeed the children of Javan, the fourth Son of Japheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) and so he writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; and so the fame. So had they Medus the Son of Medea, (for so whom they make the Exent of the Medes, though they were defended of a far more ancient Father da: and (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japheth.)

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained unto us above 2000. years, and the English Speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some more corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange, if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian, (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have been found in the Languages of those Countreys. For which reasons we doubt not but these personal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. In Italy, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Grecian Janus which commanded them, and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. years. (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fifth King: which also Saint Augustine and Justine confirm: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibility. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of them make add thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesla (others Camsena) the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vespal Virgins in Rome (the Laitines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Hethenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to believe that Noah himself (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all mankind had choise of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungrateful, to let up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himself.

SECT. VI.

That Gomer also and his Son Togorma of the Posterity of Japheth, were first seated about Asia the Less: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

To turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the World's Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countreys bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such manner, as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River: because the Land was very Desert, and overgrown with Woods, Reeds, Boggs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chush took the South part of Chaldea down the River of Euphrat, by which he might pass to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur, or Orchoz, near the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same River get up to Euphrat, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gobon Southward, Moset, in the description of Paradise, calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed in the East) were for a while oppressed, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made his own Nation and victorious. Havilah, the brother of Nimrod, and son of Chush, took both Banks of Tygris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also pass to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial Seat of which Region of Havilah, or Sesian, was anciently called Chushan or Chushan, afterward Susa. Chush himself took the Banks of Gobon, and planted those Countreys Westward, and Southward, and towards Arabia the Stony, and the Desert, where Ptolemy placeth the City of Chusidra, first Chusidra.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia Felix, had Tygris, to convey them into the Persian gulf, which watheth the Banks of Arabia Felix on the East-side: so as those Sons of Chush might take Land down the River as they pleased. Also the City of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tygris, and from thence a Colony passed to Charran, standing also upon a navigable Branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japheth's Sons settle themselves together, and took their Seats in Asia the less: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to Reason, that both Gomer, Magag, and Tubal late down first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palästina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer, or his Children, passed on into Asia the less, as those of Magag and Tubal did: from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia; and the Magagians more Northward into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the less, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witness Herodotus) the same Region Liba, which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Gallia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle fo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places, as to the Mountains about Albania (called Cymmerion) and to the City of Cymmeria in Phrygia: also Eusebius Cymmerion took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a City of that name, called Cymmerian: which Phineas (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Town in Campania, so called of the unhealthful waters favouring of Brimstone, which Angustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lacrine.

The Children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Meshechites were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezekiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolemy calleth Meschi inhabit a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountains Meschiei, in the Valley between the Mountains Meschiei, and the Mountains Paridar: out of whose North part springeth the River Phasis: from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech (saith Melanchthon) significth that at first did inhabit amongst his Parents and Kindred: The Togormians were also called Gibeli, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchy of Phœnicia, the same which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Mashek, which hewed stones for the Temple at Jerusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the less Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Togormians.

For in Gen. 10. 3. 11.

called Tigraues, and their Cities Tigraurkate: of which Cities, Tigraues subdued by Lucillus the Roman, built one. Pherecydianus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary, forgetting the Prophecy of Ezechiel against the Tyrans: They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Fairs, Horses, and Horned Oxen; which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by Land. But Josephus takes them for the Parents of the Phrygians: which I do not deny, but they might be, in the ensuing Ages, and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrod's reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germans. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks defended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Mosovia. But for these subdivisions it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second Plantation, and of the first Nations after the Flood, is the matter which I labour to discover, and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, That those Grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of less understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could be hardly known: only reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the reft, and were covered with the fame of others who took on them the Conduccion and Dominion over the reft.

From Madai the third Son of Japheth, were the Medes. The Greeks bring them (as before) from Medus the Son of Media.

SECT. VII.

Of Javan the fourth Son of Japheth: and of Melchec of Aram, and Melchec of Japheth.

OF Javan the fourth Son of Japheth came the Ionex, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Ezay, Et interpretamur eis qui salsam ferunt ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Greciam: And I will send thee that scape of them in Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Greeks here use the word (Tarshish) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarsus in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigraui in the Geneva use the names of Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Ionex were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Aborigines, or men without Anchors, and growing (as it were) out of the Soyl it self: who abounding in people, fencd Colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Ionex of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Iun the Son of Nahib, the Son of Davathian; but the Antiquity of Javan makes the fashion of that supposition, who for many years preceded Nahib, Iun, or Davathian. Pausanias tells us, that Nahib stole out of Thibaly with all his Fathers Treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athena, he was graciously received by Erichon, who gave him his Daughter in marriage; of whom he received two Sons, Iovand and Acheus, the supposed Ancestors of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionis, both Plutarch in the life of Thibis.) who, when he had joynd Megara to Attica, erected a Pillar in that Jubus or Strait, which fiftenth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece; writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hec non sunt Peloponnesus, est Ionia; The Countries are not Peloponnesus, but of Ionia; and on the other side which looketh towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: Thes ports are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecatus affirmeth, that the Ionex came cut of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Ionex of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the less, the name of Ionex was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I find this conjecture of Hecatus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet sure I am that Asia the less had people before Greece had any; and that Javan did not sic him Babylonia into Greece, but took Asia the less in his passage; and from thence pass over the neerer way, leaving his own name to some maritime Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himself believed, that Ionia took the name from Iun the son of Nahib; for so much he had learned from themselves: which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times call themselves into that part of Asia the Less, opposite unto them, which they held for divers years. And howsoever the Greeks vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their own) deride and disprove their pride and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) relied between the Seythians and the Egyptians, as Justin out of Trogus, in the War between Vexans of Egypt, and Tanis of Syria, witnesseth: which preceded far the reign of Mimus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Ceopros time the Greeks were all Salvages, without Law or Religion, living like brute Beasts in all respects: and Ceopros (saith Saint Augustine) lived together with Moses.

The sixth son of Japheth was Melchec, whom the Septuagint call Mosech (a part of those Nations Gen. 10 commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Melchec and Tubal). But this we must remember, that between Melchec the son of Aram, and Melchec (or Mosech) the son of Japheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus, with the Vulgar, writeth Mosech, the first of Aram, Mos; the Geneva, Mos; Junius, Mos; but it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that either Melchec the son of Japheth, was the parent of those people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himself: or else (which may rather seem) that it took name from Mosech the son of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words: Wo is me that I remain in Melchec, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinus tam diu: habitus sarcinum servitus Kedarum: The Septuagint gives it this sense: Wo is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est; habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Assis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum: O woe to me, for I have travelled among those of Ass: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or whichsoever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petrea; and the Chaldean putteth Ass in stead of Melchec, but the Hebrew it self hath Melchec. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Melchec the son of Aram, 1 Chron. 17, is called Melchec, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Melchec or Melchec both bordering Judea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Melchec and Tubal. But as for those that take Melchec out of the word Mosech given by the Septuagint to be the Mosovians: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as if aforesaid. Sure I am that David never travelled so far North (for to him Mosovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the fame being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Melchec the Father of the Mosovians; and herein also Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and sets Melchec in Mosovia, though with some better advice of judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, (Hei mihi quod exalto super gentes, super fratres infirmos meos) to signify: Gente super fratres infirmos meos: That the ferocity of this Nation exceeded: which fiercer or brutality of the Mosovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same ferocity or cruelty which those Northern Mosovians had, may aswell be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarians. For this Country took name of Kedar the second son of Ismael, of whom a people of equal fierceness to any of the World were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people): the fame being fore-told by the speech of the Angel to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12, And he shall be a wild man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desert (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochet on the East, and the Cedrai Southward, both which join together upon the Nabathaei. So it appeareth (as before) that Melchec, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Mazg, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did join to Melchec: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the Less, commanded by the successors of Seleucus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I have already said) it might well be, that long after the first Plantation the issue of Melchec (or Mosech) might pass into Cappadocia, and thence into Ephrasia, and give names both to Mazg in the one, and to the Mountains Moschib in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly in Mosovia, and so all opinions saved. But all salvage Nations over-grown and uncultivated, do (for the most part) grow a late Plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witness antiquity.

Tyras, the seventh son of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Ubracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the World Tyrar peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speak of the Sons of Gomer; which were three.

Afancez, Riphath, and Togorma.

SECT. VIII.

Of Afancez, and Riphath the two elder Sons of Gomer.

AS ANCEZ was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regini, (saith Josephus) but he gives no reason why.

Eusebius makes Afancez the Father of the Goths. The Jews in their Thargum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their explications are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Afancia in Phrygia, near the Rivers of Hilax and Gos: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuscanes were descended of the Afancez. (For Tuscanos, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Afancez, praefixio anteculo dicit Afancez) and that the word signifieth, a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the Lake Afancia, known by that name in the Roman time. And among the Kings which were to the succour of Troy, was Afancius (Dee finitius, saith Homer) like unto God: because he was beautiful and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Or Immensis Dee finitius: In face and body like one of the gods: Virgili also remembereth such a River, together with the Hills Gargara: as Ilia dicit amor tuns Gargara, transque fontanus Acianicus: Appetite leads them both over the mountain Gargara, and the roaring Afancius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Afancius, which is adjoining to Myfia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Afancez he directs us to find by the description of Prusis, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Prusis to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lieth, even between Prusis and Nicea. And so Justin (as I conceive him) takes them of Afancez, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and that the North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Afancius the Son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Afancia a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witnesseth; and Strabo giveth Afancia both a Lake, a River and a Town in Myfia, near unto Cio; which also agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prusis (before spoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy, Afancez.

Now, whether these places took name of Afancez the Son of Gomer, or of Afancius the Son of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Afancius which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Aeneas the Son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it seemeth that the Countreys where these famous came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Myfia, but farther off, and from the North parts of Asia the less, which by Hieremy is called Afancez, by the figure Synechdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which decide not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy we shall learn of what Nation the Afancez were, were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Agancz, against her, &c. meaning, against the Babylonians, Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, I confess of the Mountains of Ararat which run through it: Minni, the lesser Armenia; Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name (faith Juvius and others before him:) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Story of Jacob and Ejau, call it Aram-Padam. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Agancz joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the Spoil of the Babylonian Empire) we shall ere much to call Agancz Germany, or Almain: for we hear of no Swart Rusters at that siege. But the Agancz were of those Nations which were either subject or allied to the Medes: of which if any one of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhægi; or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almaines; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will think as they do.

Of Rhipath, the second Son of Gomer, there is mention in the first of Chronicles, Bernadus and Pererius, think that he wandered from far off the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his Plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that he might fear himself with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no room or soil in those days for all the Sons and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Rhiphei were of Rhipath, which the Greeks afterwards (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagonians: and Rhiphei (faith Melancthon) significth Giants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti, who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Rhiphei for the love of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names, and became Heneti (a custom exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Rhiphei (afterward Heneti) fought new Regions, they came along the shores of Eufratus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they crost thwart the Land, and peopled Illyria, delusive (faith Melancthon) of a warmer soil of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti, or Veneti, whom Melancthon taketh to be one people, filled all the Baltick and Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were posselt of Lithuania and Polonia, disturbed the Plantation of the Bœi and Hermondurii. Therefore it seemeth to me, that of Rhipath, came the Riphei, afterwards Heneti; and so thinketh Arias Montanus, first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time, Lords of Sarmatia, and those other parts before remembered, chiefly between the Rivers of Vistula and Albis. The name (faith Melancthon) significth wandering, or wanderers, or Nomades: a people which lived by white-meats and Fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third Son of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Javan's Children, which were four:

Elifsa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

SECT. IX.

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.

OF Elifsa, or Elipha, came the Ezer: and of this Elifsa, all the Greeks were called Hellenes, faith Montanus. Melancthon makes Elifsa the Father of the Ezer in Asia side: Others of Eli in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greeks were defended in general of Javan, it is probable that Ezer and the Elei, took name of Elifsa his eldest Son. Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elifsa, Hyacinthus & purpuris de insulis Elifsa sœlia sunt operimentum: blue silk and purple, brought from the Isles of Elifsa, were their covering. The Chaldeans for Eliza, write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurines, the Geneva, and Juniur, keep the word Elifsa: and so I think they might do with reason. For there is not found any such Purple. Die in Italy in these days, nor since that I can read of: but those of Elifsa were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Eubœia.

Tharsis the second Son of Javan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa: but reserving the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa). But Solomon's Ships were prepared in the Red-Sea at Ezion-Gaber, in the Bay of Elate, near unto Madian, where Jethro (Moses Father-in-law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petrea, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they failed to the higher part of the East-India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three years in the passage between Judea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have failed in fix or ten days. And if so great riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterræne Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Solomon is in this sort written of, in the fifth of Kings: Also King Solomon made a Navie of Ships in Ezion-Gaber, which is beside Elath, and the brink of the Red-Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Navie his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the servants of Solomon: and they came to Ophir, and ret from thence 4200. Talents of gold, &c. But as the Nations of Pontus thought no Sea in the World like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterræne in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis used often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Ships of Solomon went every three years to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we use it ordinarily wherefore we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea; or that they are set out every year, or every three years to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it self. But in this place, Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chief City in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second Son of Javan, or by his Successors in memory of their first Parent. To this City arrived Alexander Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himself into the River to bathe and wash his body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was S. Paul born. Now, this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other Sons inhabiting Asia the less, and that part of Syria adjoining) Javan, who was to pass over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Ionians on that shore: gave the Islands between Asia the less and Greece to Elifsa, and left Tharsis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third Son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, faith Bernadus, but I allow better of Melancthon's opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (faith he) and signifies percepses, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Isa. 23. (according to Melancthon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hæc calamitas ab Elai prædicta est, qui capite victissimo terro inquit, venturos esse cœlestes Tyri ex terra Cettim: This Calamity (faith Melancthon) was foretold by Elai the Prophet, who in the three and seventieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from the Continent (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, faith Bernadus), yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophecy which took effect by the destruction of the Tyrrians by Alexander, who, after seven Months siege spent that proud City, and cut in pieces seven thousand principal Citizens; strangled two thousand, and changed the freedom of 13 thousand others into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appear plainly in the first of the Maccabees in these words: of Philip, King of the Perlians, and Medes, Trojanus Kets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (faith he) there remaineth the City Cittium, the Country of Zeno the Philosopher (witness Laertius) which City Pittus upon Ezechiel's affirmeth, that it stood in S. Hieroms time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim; and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet, because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too straight for his people, after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both in Asia and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and brothers, he sent Colonies over the Ægean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodonim the fourth Son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) fate down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharsis, and Elifsa, as he could. For Dodonim and Rhodonim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so alike, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebraicis affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodonai, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soil in Cyprus: so Dodonim (settled in a far less Island) did of necessity lend his people farther off; and keeping along the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elifsa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epyrus. And though the City of Dodonai was not then built (or perchance not so ancient as Dodonim himself) yet his posterity might give it that name in the memory of their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noah's children, and grand-children: not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them, by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken and grafted else-where. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) free from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mefech, and the rest, round about him. And in like sort did Cethim (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the Sons of Cethim (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travelled Southward in Arabia Felix, and South-westward into Arabia Petrea: the rest of his children held the Regions adjoining to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Cethim in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoining. The Sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the Sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterræne Sea: of whom I shall speak hereafter. But first of the Sons of Cham or Ham's which were four:

Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

SECT.

SECT. X.

That the feat of Chush the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scriptures, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

¶ I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopes, Wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the feat of Chush.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, vers. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great City in Thebaid, called Cheraia (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now, though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chush could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraz, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert, which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babelonia to Nimrod, wherein they first fate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth the Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. vers. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite: together with some places which speak of Nebuchodonosor's Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Num. 12. vers. 1. as also else-where, understand Chush for Ethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself here-in: and then it will appear that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention.

For Josephus, presuming that Chush was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a Woman of Chush) was a Woman of the Land of Ethiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Sabe her Fathers City: and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, the practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the re-Antiq. l. 2. citing lish thus in Josephus. And after he had described the strength of the Ethiopian City Mere, which he saith at length Chambyser, called so from the name of his Sister (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Mose redire exercitum ostium aggre ferret, hoste non audente manus confregit, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum Regis filia nomine Tharbis, &c. Which Tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not fall in and come to hand-to-hand, there happened this accident in the mean while: The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admiring his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only up-beld and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession, whereupon the confederating, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

¶ II.

A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

THIS Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it self to have been the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia, for Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabæans are Arabians, and not Æthiopian; except Josephus can persuade us, that the Queen of Saba, which came from the South to hear the Wisdom of Solomon, were a Negroe, or Black-moor. And though Damianus a Goer speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John, of the Abissines: wherein that Ethiopian King would persuade the Portugals, that he was descended of the Queen of Saba, and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sisoac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sacked Hierusalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba and Solomon) who joyntly upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprise, as also given aid and succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the Daughter of Jethro, Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North-east of the Red-Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and near Elson-Gaber, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red-Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Idumæa joyntly with the Tribe of Juda by the North: to Arabia Petraz, by the East: to the Mediterranean, by the West; and to the Red-Sea, by the South-East. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived forty years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Josephus confesseth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fed from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter, it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the Sheep of Jethro his Father-in-Law, Priest of Madian, and drove the Flock to the Desert, and came to the Mountain of God in Horeb. Now, that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, every infant knoweth. And if we believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negroe, but a Midianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as discomfolute, and a stranger) defended the Daughters of Reguel from other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose Daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Towns or Countries.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Jethro had been an Ethiopian, it had been a fair progress for him to have passed throughout all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moses, and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraz (which joyntly to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered forty years, and did by these late travels of his, seek to instruct the Children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milk of Idolatry, and obstatinate in the Religion of the Heathens, and finding that those stiff plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this Opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehended Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sippora. His own words show this beginning: Monstrum etiam Apollinaris duas uxoribus habuisse Moysen, &c. Apollinaris also saith, in affirming that Moses had two Wives: and who doth not perceive these things feigned by them: for it is manifest, that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt: being the same that joyntly to Arabia: So saith Chrysostomus.

¶ III.

Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezechiel 29. 10.

NOW, as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the Wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopissa; so in the conquest of Nebuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nebuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Tower of Sevechen, even to the borders of the Chusites, which lait words should have been thus converted: From the Tower Sevechen, to the border of the Chusites, or Arabians, between which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Sevechen to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all. Sevechen it self being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the Black-moors. So as if Nebuchodonosor conquest had been but between Sevechen and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did express no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Country, lying between Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countries joyntly together: or all the North parts of England between Warwick and Scotland: for this hath the same fence with the former, if any man sought to express by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Warwick being the North border of England, as Sevechen or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida, which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nebuchodonosor never entered into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Ethiopia for Chush.

¶ IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, Chap. 30. Vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

AND as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this place converted, In die illa egredientur nuntii a facie mea in visitandum ad conserendum Æthiopiae confidendum: Which place is thus turned in English by the Genevans: In that day shall their messengers go forth from me in ships to make the careless Moors afraid. Now, the Latine for (ships) hath the Greek word Trires, for Triremes, which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should have been (as in the former) amended by using the word Chush, or Arabia, for Ethiopia, or the Black-moor, every man may see which meanly understandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to pass out of Egypt into Ethiopia, there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to pass out of Northampton into Leicester-shire: Ethiopia being the conteminate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nebuchodonosor should send Gallies along the Coast of the Red-Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Sney (signifying the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Army might thereby surprize them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nebuchodonosor was at Sevechen within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gally nor Ship to pass into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land thire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it; for the fall of Nilus (tumbling down over high and steepy Mountains) called Canadupa Nilus, were at hand.

Lastly,

Lastly, I have already observed, the Sons of every Father (eaten themselves as near together as possibly they could; Gomer and his Sons in Asia the left; Javan and his Sons in Greece, and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the sons and grand-children of Chubb from the River of Gebon (their Fathers first left) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Ham on the one side, and Saba, Shaba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had never acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Æthiopian Black-moors, as is remembered in the Chapter of Paradise.

¶ V.

A place, Eliay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by asking Chubb for Æthiopia.

And as in these places before remembered, so in divers others is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia, or Chubb, which puts the Story (where it is for understood) quite out of square: one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what fence hath this part of Scripture, Isai. 18. Ve terra Cymbalorum alarum que est trans flumina Æthiopie; or, according to the Septuagint, in these words: Ve terra navium alarum que est trans fluvios Æthiopie; Wo to the Land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, sending Embassadors by Sea, even the Vessels of Reeds upon the waters. Ve terra umbroso ore; Wo to the Land of the shady coast, faith Junius. The former Translators understood it in this sense; That the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significantly called the wings of the ships; the other, that the coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Isaiab, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this Message to the Israelites, which Isaiab receiveth, and by the former Translation, every man may see the transposition of Kingdoms; for hereby Egypt is transported unto the other side of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia set next unto Judea; when it is the Land of Chubb and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judea and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is seated under the Equinodial Line. And in this, Beraldu asketh a material question (to wit) what Reason that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? Nam de ignota q̄ regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now, if Æthiopia it self be under the Equinodial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we shall impiously think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona Esperanza.

¶ VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaca in the Story of Senacherib, and Lera in the Story of Abā, are unadvisedly made *Æthiopian*s.

AND by this Translation is the Story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib was first repelled at Pelufium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judea: when Isaiab, having certain knowledge that Thirrhakeh (which all the Interpreters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatening Messengers to Ezechia King of Judea, persuading him to submit himself: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Ashur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem, commanded by Rabsheke, with the other which lay before Pelufium, a great City upon the branch of Nile next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judea and Benjamin, with a third a King (which himself commanded) being then at the siege of Lerna. But upon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Antiq. Josephus calls Tharshish) Rabsheke halted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachir, and set down before Lerna, which was afterwards called Elezthoropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelufium, and Antiq. feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Hierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 180000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechia is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that it was come to a foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now, the Desert which lay indifferent between Lik-loua, Hierusalem and Pelufium, was that of Pharon or Sin, which also toucheth on the three Arabias; to wit, the Story, of which it is a part; the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabian come on to succour either Pelufium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desert between Pelufium and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this description of the second of Kings, Verf. 9. hath the like mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chubb) is also translated Æthiopia, and in this sense have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse: He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. Whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius: Audient autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Cushi; He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Cushites. For they were the Cushites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very smok of Judea flaming was blown, being their nearest Neighbours: as Plin. l. 5. were not the Æthiopian Black-moors under the Equinodial, whom neither War nor Peace (which ever covereth all Regions) ever found out, faith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia: than Zerab was, who invaded Asia King of Juda, with an Army of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army, and those Chariots should pass through all Egypt (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how far distant, judge. For Princes do not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever such strength of Black-moors heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopian King Travellers or Conquerours; and yet is this King Zerab also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chubb being first so converted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdoms, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

2. Chron. cap. 14.

¶ VII.

A farther Exposition of the place, Eliay. 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eliay, Navium alarum, Winged Ships (to the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbal alarum (according to the Latins) (sail mistaking in the words, or terra umbroso ore (after Junius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and St. Hierom, have one sense in effect. For the sails are commonly called the wings of a Ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our Ships sail slowly, that the wanteth wings (that is) when her sails are either worn, or too narrow: and we also use the same phrase of the wind whistling in the sails. And it may be that the Egyptians employed for many of those small ships, as their sails were said to give a shadow over the Red-Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Isaiab) affirmeth, that the word (Sabab) doth signify both to shadow, and to gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this phrase (faith Pintus) is this: *Wo to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others: safeguard, under the shadow of thy wings; which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the argument of the 18th. Chapter of Isaiab: and this phrase is often elsewhere used, as in the 16. Psalm: Sab umbra alarum tuarum protege me. Defend me under the shadow of thy wings.* The Boats of Reed spoken of are of two kinds: either of basket-Willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottom, and built up on both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

SECT. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

¶ I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt; and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

THE second son of Ham, was Mizraim; who (according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chubb first possit Chaldea on the West side of Gebon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in people, he entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red-Sea, and to the South-east side of Judea. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past over into Asia. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these four brothers possit all that Tract of Land, from Gebon in Chaldea, as far to the West as the Mediterranean Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petra, all Canaan which embraceth Galile, Samaria, and Judea; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the neither is bounded by Mempis on the South, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the North; and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Æthiopian, or Black-moor. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Plus peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the rest of Nab's children fort themselves.

¶ II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunnary years, which made their Antiquities seem more fabulous.

THIS flourishing Kingdom possit by Mizraim, changed her antient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Ramessis, as some think) the son of Eliab, thence his elder brother Danias, shifting him out that part of Greece, now called Morrea, by whom the Argives were made Dana, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. years after the Flood, in the time of Eusebius. But in Homer's Odyssie it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan War. And before this, Egypt was named by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Ostrana, &c. And Manetho (whom Josephus citeth in his first Book against Appion) numbeth all the Kings of Egypt after Mos's departure, who continued 393. years. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name, 330. years after Jofua, and about 1000. years after the Flood. But where Josephus in the same Book taketh Isael to be those *Egypt*s, which he also calleth Phostores, or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. years: who also he calleth his Ancestors (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manetho saith, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many years.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod, Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (faith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000. years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also life among the Aethiopian and Arabians.

cadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

Ante Jovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa Juis.

The Aradians the Earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000. years, it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their years by months, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100 years, whether we take their Months or Lunar years to have been of the first kind of 27. days and eight hours; or otherwise 29. days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunar years.

§. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

Grandis Mercator, in his Chronologie, reasons for the Egyptian Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptian times) had beginning with the general Flood; and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer: That there in Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Flood; which Eusebius maketh 292. years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynasty (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Salus, to have been in the year of the World 1846. which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16. Dynasty was begun but in the 292. year after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190. years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynasty to endure 115. years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100. years: for the 28. had but six years, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. years.

Now, Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. years: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. year after the Flood: so as where Mercator maketh all the 15. to precede the Flood, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the Flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of Falhood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. year that Nimrod, with the Sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no difference, nor Inter-plantation at all. And though he hastily converted Gomer into Babyl, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth year of Nimrod's reign (which was ten years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt possess, and a Government established in the very first year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or any Expedition far off, or near, in question: for, from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

§. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. years after the Creation, at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled with 100. or 200. years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposed that it was not inhabited at all before the general Flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quemadmodum enim primos mundi duces, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari possint, ut ad Egyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagassent, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred years of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confess, that there were then both the Africans and other Nations.

Now, seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving-belief, it is lawful for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gain say any mans opinion out of any croaking or cavelling humors: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate reticements, to maintain factions needless, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this Opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Flood, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a less increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, and (after a few years) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who being fearful that the death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the land of Nod, and there, by the help of his own issues, built a City (called Erech) after the name of his first-born. Now, if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. years by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancy of the first Age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years the same (if not a greater) number might be increased increased; and so within 70. years after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. years) Affria, Syria, and Egypt might be peopled before the Flood, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonians and Affrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first 100. or 130. years after the Flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For, that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it self denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerful numbers which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three millions (and the left not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few years after the Flood, it might also be plentifully filled in like time before it: For after their own account, Ninus governed Babylonia and Affria but 292. years after the Flood of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterranean Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her invasion some what less or more than 390. years: for so much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confess, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one half be true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Foot-men, and 500000. Horse-men, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time be peopled; and Semiramis, have been plentifully peopled: when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entered (notwithstanding) in league with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now, if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Justine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Ninus: Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vxoritis Rex Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vxoritis King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians of which the uncivilized Pontus, the other Egypt, and how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and all that toward the Bactrian; yea all that whole Body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbeth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000 Foot-men, and 200000 Horse-men: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster's Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for foreign Authority? for no man doubteth, but that Egypt was peopled by Misraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abraham's time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure, to prepare and cultivate a desolate and over-grown ground, to beautify it with many Cities, Laws and Policies, cannot be effected a labour of a few days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200 years after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many millions of men were found within 300 years after the general Flood; so as not only Babylon and Affria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, far-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what corners could then all those Nations be comprehended, which 1656 years brought forth before the Flood? even necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known World; especially, where death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had belied living Nations of his own body.

§. V.

Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Peterius.

FOR what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800 or 900 years? Surely we have reason to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World; wherein if one exceed fifty years, for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by Wars, or Plillence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the Earth, with all the industry of man, could not give them food. What strange heaps then of Souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900 years as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been born in Britain since three or four hundred years before the Norman Conquest (sparing such as by accident, or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Pogromy might have been increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and Mighty Ones of the first Age observed no Law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Lovers of the World and Pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal Time which Nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger, which they could fly from, or elude. For what humane Argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearless of death, than the little time which keeps them afloat, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and fawerth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now, if that Berosus or Annius may be alleged for sufficient Authority, then is it by them affirmed, and by Josephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life-time of Cain, and all those times between his death and the Flood; which were by estimation five or eight hundred years. And sure, though this fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore St. Hierome, for such Authors gives a good Rule : Bona cornu elegamus, vitium contraria : Let us chuse what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly, in the very beginning of the first Book, Jerofus agreeth (in effect) with Moser, touching the General Flood : and in that first Part Jerofus affirmeth, that those Mighty Men and Giants which inhabited Emech, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universal World : and though that Phrase (Of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof ; as in the second of the Acts, That there dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven : yet by the words which follow in Jerofus, it is plain, that his words and sense were the same : for he addeth, From the Sun rising to the Sun setting ; which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more passable and easy to travel over before the Flood than after it. For Petrus himself confesseth, that Antica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200 years after Ogges Flood ; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into far Countries after the General Deluge, when the Earth lay (as it were) inclosed for an hundred or an hundred and thirty years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and less cumbersome to walk over, in the first Age, than after the General Overflowing.

VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. Vers. ult. whereupon Petrus grounded his opinion.

I Astly, whereas Petrus draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the Tenth of Genesis ; And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood : Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium ; By which it appeareth (Saith Petrus) that there was no such division before the Flood, which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of Tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak : The Text itself rather teacheth the contrary : For out of these (Saith Moser) were the Nations divided in the Earth after the Flood : inferring, that before the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Flood, or to any plantation or division in that Age : for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noah's Sons, wherein doth that necessary division controul the planting of the World before it ? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion : It is true, that it was so for that present ; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther off and general plantation : as Jerofus says well, that when man-kind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandum novus sedes necessitas compellerat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we find (as it is before said) that within 300. years after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers ; with their increase for any long times all Asia, the Greater and the Lesser all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof, Mauritania, and Lybia, being also that time fully peopled. And if we believe Jerofus, then not only those parts of the World but (within 140. years after the Flood) Spain, Italy, and France were also planted : much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the Flood, in the time of the chief strength of mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly, seeing all the World was overflowed, there were people in all the World which overflowed.

VII.

A Conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities : with somewhat of Phut (another Son of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

Therefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Pulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities : so I do not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Petrus or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to think that Egypt being peopled before the Flood, 200. or 300. years more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (Of Stone or Metal) of their former Kings or Governours : which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Jerofus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Egges. For they both write, that the use of Letters, and the Art of Astrology was known to the Babylonians 3624. years before Alexanders Conquest : and this report Annius findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Emech, who was born 1034. years before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire ; as also of Christ his coming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and e-Plantation of Egypt : I will conclude this very man to his own reason, I will conclude this people by Mizraim, as it is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus, the Son of Belus, as aforesaid, being divided into two Regions, that part from Mempbis, or Nicopolis, to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the more ancient Delta : because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of the Greek Letter Delta, which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east, and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pisumum, where Senacherib was repulsed. The other branch, which yielded it self to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria : The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Mempbis and Syene near Ethiopia, and had the the name of Thebaida, of the ancient City of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates : and therefore called Civitas centum portarum ; and by the Greek, Dispolis : in the Scriptures No-hamon ; which significth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Joseph calls Egypt, Mesraim of Mizraim : and Hierodorus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut, the third Son of Ham, took the next portion of Land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia : whose people were anciently called Phutici (Saith Josephus) and Phry mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania : which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush, and Lud were contemini, and associates with the Egyptians.

SECT. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan : with the names of his eleven Sons.

Canaan (the fourth Son of Ham) posselt all that Region, called by the Romans Palestina ; in the Scriptures Galilee, Samaria, and Judea ; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy-Land and Juria : the limits whereof are precisely fet down by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou goest to Gerar until Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Adma, and Zeboim, even unto Latha. Now, howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was, that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North ; Sodom and Gomorrah the East, and the other Cities named, stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan South-ward : and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now, the Sons of Canaan which posselt this Country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heib, or Chethu.
3. Jebusi, or Jebusaeus.
4. Emori, or Emoreus, or Amorites.
5. Giregisi, or Giregisus.
6. Heiv, or Chivens.
7. Arki, or Harkeus.
8. Seni, or Sineus.
9. Arada, or Aradaeus.
10. Zemar, or Samareus, or Tzemaureus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamathens, or Chamatheus.

Of which the most renowned were the Heibites, Giregisites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizizites : which Perizizites were descended of Zemar, or Samarius, or from some of his.

III.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first-born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phoenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asser : for Asser, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phoenicia distributed among them ; but the Asserites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth, or Cethus : of whom came the Hevites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out ; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizizites, the Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Befur, and about Gerar, which Moser maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, Gen. 23 : having the Defart of Pharan to the South : for about Bersabe (otherwise Fucus juramenti) four miles from Gaza, dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittites, did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Clans Anankim Gen. 27. 46 were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared : as in the seventh of the Kings ; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

Rig. 7. 6.

III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebusaeus, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal feat was Jebus (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Country near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both : yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon.

Amorites was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Ammon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West : of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sidon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan : as behind Libanus, in the edge of Callosyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Juda, and in Idumea, near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometimes called Amorites : as in Deut. 1. Gergesites the fifteenth : For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerful Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos : He destroyed I the Amorite, before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

IV.

¶. IV.

Of the Gergefites, Hevites and Harkites.

THe fifth Son of Canaan was Gergefus, or Gergefus (otherwise Gergaf) who inhabited on the East-side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy sets the City Gersa, which Josephus calls Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossessed the possessed with devils; and the Gergefites desired him to depart their Coasts, because their Swine, filled with the evil Spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee: Gergefus also built Beritus (some-time Geris) afterward Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large privileges.

Hevites the sixth Son, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited upon Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Capthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the Wars of Josia, and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh Son was Aradus, or Araki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterranean Sea (over against Tripoli) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachi.

¶. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sineus the eighth Son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparsia, which Ptolemy finds in Judæa, not far from Jribus; to the South thereof, faith Justinus. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which Saint Hierome calls Sim: Ptolemy, Simyra: Metla, and Pliny, Symirus: Brochard, Sycon (called Synochus) near Arca, Porcius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Deserts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Sinochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini, written with the letter C, (otherwise Kemai) who defended of Hobab the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the wilderness of Pharan. But the Cini were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Neplustims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cini, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth Son was Aradeus, or Aradeus, who in the Isle of Aradus, built the City Arados: opposite against which Island, on the Main of Phœnicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Amradus. To this City came Saint Peter (faith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skillfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his Prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Aradus were thy Mariners. cap. 27. v. 8.

¶. VI

Of Zemari.

OF Samarcus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers Opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Calosyria at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, which in Josia is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarajum (of the same Orthography) upon the Mountain of Ephraim (faith Bernaldus in Bernaldus) mentioned in the second of Chron. c. 13. Chron. l. 4. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amiss (faith he) by Smeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samarcus (of whom were the Perizæites) the Parent of the Emassani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Calosyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth, And he bought the Mountain Samaria, 1 Kings or Shemeron of one Shemar for two Talents of Silver, 16. 28. and built in the Mountain; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemar, Lord of the Mountain Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the Conquest of the Holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritans were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a peridious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews: when it suffered, or failed, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturals.

¶. VII.

Of Hamathi.

THe last of Canaan's Sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath (faith Bernaldus;) of which (the aspiration taken away) the name is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present, Josephus, and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountain Casius, and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were born; but Antioch, firnamed Epiphania, as Bernaldus supposeth, which standeth between Apamea and Emesa in Cassioti. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which Neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas St. Hierom setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land

Job. 4. 75. 19-33.

Gal. Tyr. 17.

Land divided. And if Libanus it self were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces, Ludicia, and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken, could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Joshua is directly proved. For Joshua counting the Lands that remained unpossessed, reckoned all Mount Libanon towards the Sun-rising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermion, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: Because David accepted the Presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithal) conditions of Peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight: For if the Promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Mosé and Joshua: for Emath is indeed situated on the other side of the Mountain of Hermion, which joyneth to Libanus; and is otherwise called Iurex. But whereas Hamath is named in Joshua 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therein (saith Bernardus) was S. Hierom mistaken. Emath or Iurex is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephthali should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Amath, and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affidim: which City S. Hierom writes Emath; Josephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amathin, and the people of Amathin, of which (as I take it) Rabshakeb vaunteth in the second of Kings; Where is the God of Hamath?

SECT. XIII.

Of the Sons of Chush (excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.)

The Sons of Chush were,	}	Sheba, Havila, Saba, Raama, Sabeta, Nimrod.	}	And the Sons of Raama, were, Dedan.
-------------------------------	---	--	---	--

¶ I.

That most of the Sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Solomon.

Saba or Saba was the eldest Son of Chush, the eldest Son of Ham; to make a difference between him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama or Regna (or Regna after Montanus) his Name is written with a single (S) Saameth, and Sheba the Son of Regna with an (S) Sapient, which is the Hebrew, Sabin. Sheba the eldest Son of Chush, Regna his Brother, and Sheba the Son of Regna possessed both the shores of Ar-

bia Felix. Saba took that part towards the Red-Sea, as neareth his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regna and Sheba the East-coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulf of Persea; of which Pliny; Sabei, Arabum populi, populi thura clarissimi, ad utraque maris parviti gentibus habitant: The Sabaeans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red-Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia, a populo mixtione, saith Pothellus. To this agreeeth Ptolemy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red-Sea, and the City Rhagana towards the Persian Sea; with whom also we may leave Saba: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolemy, because he remembereth a Nation (called Stabei) near the Persian Sea; and Mossabube which defended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regna, or (as he calls him) Rhama, into Caramania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath bannished Saba or Saba to the border of Ethiopia. But Bernardus thinks it strange, that the Sabei which stole away Job's Cattle, should run through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petrea, and find out Job in Trachinis, between Palestina and Celsyria, 1200 miles off. Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I think, that the Sabei on the Red-Sea, nor those towards the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the search upon Job, whichsoever Bernardus shall take for needful. But these were the Sabei of Arabia the Desert, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth, out of his own experience, that the City Saba is feared: the same which Ptolemy calls Sava, now Semicalac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desert, came those Agag or Wise-men, which worshipped Chus, saith Melchior whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostom, Hierom, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise-men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desert: which City, when my self was there, was (as I judged it) called Semicalac. And to approve this Opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabei were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red-Sea) are so disjoyned with large Deserts, as there is no possibility for strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of Cattle, both in respect of the Mountains, of the Sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Ubi nec homines, nec bestiae videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperius. Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, nor birds, nor, next much as trees, or any pasture or grass, but only stony, and high, stony, and craggy Mountains. Bernardus and Peterius conceive, that the Queen of Saba, which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabei, on the East-side of Arabia Felix; but the contrary seems more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, betwixt Idumea and the Red Sea, as far down as Midian, or Madian, and Ezion Gaber; and this Queen of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might, without any far travel, enter his Territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But, to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Saba, or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regna, with his Sons, Sheba and Dedan, and Sabeco, were all the possessors

for of Arabia the Happy, and the Desert: only Havilah and Nimrod dwell together on the East-side of Chus, who held Arabia Petraea. Now, for Saba, there is found of his Name, the City of Sabbata, or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Ptolemy and Ptolemy, who withal nameth Saba, take within the Walls whereof there were some towns found sixty Temples. Ezechiel joyneth the Father and the Son together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were they Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians, their Merchandize witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopian about Meroe, and Saba of the Ethiopian Ashabari; they be not worthy any farther Answer than hath already been given: especially seeing these Cities preserving the memory of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolemy's time, though in some Letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoining, the names of other of the Brethren of the Family of Chus, with little alterations, are preserved. In Arabia the Desertist, the City of Saba, or Sare (as yc Sin Sofas) with the City of Rhema, for Rhema; and the Nation by Ptolemy himself called Raaben of Raamah. In Arabia the Happy, is found the City of Rhema, and Rahana; which also keepeth the found of Rhema, the City of Sapha, or Saptah, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and Chief City in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or Sabata, towards the Red Sea, and the West of Sabata towards the Red Sea, and the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Saba; and to the South thereof again toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brothers and Nephews which were feated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tyris was a neighbour, to whom he might pass by Boat, even unto Rhema the City of Raama, or Rhema, set near the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolemy's time.

II.

Josephus his Opinion of Dedan, one of the Issue of Chus, to have been feated in the West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

And whereas Josephus (whom in this Saint Iherom followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the Son of Raamah into the West Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, and Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15th Verse, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22th Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre. If Dedan had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his Father and Brother) above four thousand miles. Besides which, the Merchandize that the Dedaites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-Moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were they Merchants in precious cloaths for thy Chariots; and that Western Ethiopian never saw cloth, till the Portugals, seeking these Coasts, traded with them: the Merchandize of their Country being Hides, Elephants Teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet-Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any Manufacture: and all these they exchanged for Linnen, or Iron chiefly.

But in those days, the West part of Africa, within the body of the Land, was known only by imagination; and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore, that the Negroes of the West Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Lina, or Niger, could either pass by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange or rather a foolish fancy. Now, to put it out of Dispute, that Dedan also dwell by the rest of the Children of Chus, which Seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet; let us hear Hieremy his own words: Fly ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Esau upon him. Herby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans; and Idumea is a Province of Arabia Petraea; and Dedan, which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, joyned in that part to Petraea, the seat of his Grand-father Chus; which neighbourhood of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy man and beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword. Ezech. 15. v. 15.

SECT. XIII.

Of the Issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremy, Chap. 9. Verse 7.

After Chus, it followeth to speak of Mizraim. The term, Sons, whose names (saith Saint Angeline) nation in were plural, to signify the Nations which came in the Libyans. Ludim, the elder Son of Mizraim, was commonly the Father of the Libyans in Africa; and thereof of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoining. Among the Sons of Shem, there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the Son of Mizraim, by the singular number: the Son of Shem being written Lud; the Son of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Libyans in Africa, and that he was feated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who joyned them in this fortgette: Come up ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moors, and the Libyans which bear the shield: for those Nations afflicted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joyned together; Ethiopia (or Chus) saith Ezechiel, 30. ver. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the Sons of Chus (which were the Chusites) the Sons of Mizraim (which were the Egyptians) and the Libyans descended of his Son Lud with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hieropolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Libyans. And I believe it, because Hieremy joyneth the Libyans and Ludians together in the place before remembered. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrews called Ludim (saith Avia Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seem to be called Lubim, or Lubai, a name somewhat near the word Liby, and not Liby, but Liby. Neither ther is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirteenth of Ezechiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Libyans at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyde, a City (hith) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike, if the City of Lyde were so feated. But Lyde (which should be written Lydda, with a double d, and is the same City which was afterwards Dialpolis, in which St. Peter cured Aenes of the Palsie) standeth near the Torrent Gas, not far from Teppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder: For there are many Cities of one name, founded in all the Regions of the World, and far alunder; as after the name of Alexander, Telencus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia: to be of divers others. St. Hierome maketh Lebanon to be the Father of Liby, who was the third Son of Mizraim: and so doth Potellus, and the other Opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Cushim and Caphorim, of whom came the Philistines, whom the Scriptures call Peletet.

These Cushim inhabited Cassitis, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Cassus are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphorim feated near Cassitis in that Tract of Egypt called Sabroth, not far from Pelusium, Strabo calls it: Sabroth, Stephanus and Pliny, Sabroth, of the City Sebron: which Orestes takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Cushim and Caphorim came the Philistines, which are called by the Septragint Allophyl (which is Alienigena, Strangers, or of a strange Kindred. These Philistines inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Idore) do not use the Letter P but instead of it (ph). Their principal Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Acaton: and the people of them called Gasei, Ascalonites, Azotites, and Acatonites: Idore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim, and of that City the Country adjoining. But where Idore had it, I know not.

The first known King of the Philistines, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a Covenant and League. This Abimelech dwell indeed at this time in Geras; but it is written, that he was also King of the Philistines, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistines unto Geras. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the Country with great glory, the rest of his Successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistines commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Cattle of Philistines (otherwise called Ascalon, or Straton Tower) which was the South border of Phoenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or Strong Giants were these Philistines: and Goliath was of this one of the five Cities above-named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lysanias. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150 years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakned by Samson and Samuel; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is Objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoining, were held by the Sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites displois the Sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this faith Perierius, that although the Palestines or Philistines held it in the time of Isaiah, yet at the time of the Promise it was possessed by the Canaanites, as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hebrews dwell in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistines were of Caphor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Isaiah witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistines, the remnant of the issue of Caphor. And in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistines will be the reliques of Caphorim: Have I not brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Caphor, and Aram from Min? I read this place with divers of the Learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Philistines de Caphor, de Sydo Cyrene, this conversion Berodatus condemneth: where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Liby: For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, between Phoenicia or Barce and Apollonia; but Kir is Asia under the Allyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and Isaiah Cyrene, and so hath the Geneva. But Perierius calls Caphorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar Translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Jonis in the North of Asia the Less. For without they inhabited Sebreiter, or Cappadocia of which manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. Secundus is written in the second of the Kings, that Isaiah the Inhabitant of Damascus King of the Allyrians carried away Isaiah seems to understand this Kir of Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media Superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Allyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syno-Media; because the Syrians by the Allyrians were there captivated.

SECT. XV.

Of the Issue of Sem.

II.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Elam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

The Posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceeded, in order with the Genealogy and Story of the Hebrews: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five Sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the Children of him and Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saving that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also laid to be the Father of the Affrians, whose Issues, and the Issues of Cham, initially contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Affrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Affur, Elam, and Lud (having India) which I believe Noah himself first inhabited; and to whom Ophir and Havilah, the Sons of Jafan afterward repaired: Hi filii Sem ad Euphrate fluvio partem Asia usque ad Oceanum Indicum tenebant: These Sons of Sem (said St. Hieron) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Atis 2. ter. 9. And the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings Seat of Persia (witness Daniel) And Jaw (saith he) in a Vision, and when Jaw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolemy) in Daniel, Ula: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Affur (as most Historians believe) the second Son of Sem, was the Father of the Affrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babel, or exceeding it. We find it in due place to approve that Opinion. Every man's hand hath been in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speak much: for the Affrians to often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane Letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and Diod. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Affrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus loilt the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the most powerful Princes among them, had yet the Mountain Taurus for the umbril of his Dominion toward the North-East, and Syria bounded him towards the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Ezay the 37. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Relaph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaflar: Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Seharuaim, Hena, and Ivah? All these were indeed but petty Kings of Cities, and Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Relaph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iuerea, under Libanus: the Ilke of Eden: Sephar, and others of this sort. Yea, Nebuchadonozor, who was most powerful before the Conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Parthia, and Phoenicia, parts thereof. But in this Question of Affur, I will speak my Opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose Plantation I have omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire; from whom the most memorable Story of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith Saint Hieron and Josephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Ur: for the Sons of Cham possit the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrews; for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the 16. is the common Opinion, taken from Josephus and Saint Hieron; but I see not by what reason he was moved to straggle thither from his friends.

§. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

Aram the first and last Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Ararite by Syria (saith Eusebius out of Josephus) which Syria lived before Mes was born, the first of which others call the Son of Abulo. Mesopotamia also, being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabarajim, which is as much to say, as Syria durum fluviorum; Syria compellit vultu two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram; and the Greeks Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy Mothers Father, and thence take thee a Wife. Sirabo also remembereth by the ancient name of Aram, or Aranea, as Jude 3. thence his own words converted witness: Quos ut Parat. 1. 19. Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramenios et Syriam Aramiam. Thos which we call Syrians (saith he) thence call Aramenians and Arameans.

Against this Opinion, that Aram the Son of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of those in Syria Inter-Amnia, which is Mesopotamia) some read Genes. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the Original read Kemuel, the Son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to understand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note, the rather, because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel Polity could be famous) we find Mesopotamia called Aram, and that with an addition, sometimes with Nabarajim, and sometimes of Pado, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seems) then also was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks, in his Notes upon Gen. 25. 20, that Padan-Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia (to wit) to that part which Ptolemy calls Ancabaria (so called from the River Chaboras, which, dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous use of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabarajim (which latter appellation questionless comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this Opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region; because the two Rivers (as it were) yoked together go along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities, in Ptolemy, called Abpadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Emphrates.

in trad.
Hieron.

Uz, or Hus, inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus, and Saint Hieron. But Tostatus mistaking this Opinion, both in them and in Lya, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth, that Abraham's Steward, Eleezer, was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus, the eldest Son of Aram, dwelt near unto his Father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea, or Tracountis; whereas the Prophet Hieremy: Rejoyce and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracountis, adjoining to Bafan, having Batanea Gadulinitis, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and People, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people, and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the Son of Nabor, the Brother of Abraham (saith S. Hieron) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Polo.

Hul, the second Son of Aram, S. Hieron makes the Father of the Armenians; as Carier, the third Son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians; which Opinion (because I find not where to find him) do not disprove, though I see no reason why Geizer should leave the fellowship of his own Brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the 16. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy setteth the City of Cholle.

Geizer (saith Josephus) founded the Baltrians: but Josephus gave all Noah's children feathers, to carry them far away in all half. For mine own Opinion, I always keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Geizer seated himself near his Brothers in the Body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassitis, and Sekewis, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Met, or Mesib the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the Mountain Mafius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his Sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desert parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while; so ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, let them asunder. For although these Sons of Aram, and the Sons of the rest of Noah's children kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdom; yet therein every one also fought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities, therein built, their own names; thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one cumulating and disdaining the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Pern excepted, because those Countreys are unaccessible to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Met, the fourth Son, is made the Parent of the Mesians: of whom something had been spoken already. Arphaxad, the third Son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two Sons, Phaleg and Jedai: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth divided. chap. 8. Sect. 7.

§. III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

The many People which at the division (at Phaleg's birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (saith Perrinus out of Sedar Hblam, one of their Chronicles) affirm, that this partition hapod at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the year after the Flood 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, make 340. And therefore was it so many years after the Flood, ere the children of Noah levered themselves. But to this Opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make, how in so few years as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) so many people could be increased, Perrinus gives this Answer, That 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 60000. fighting men in 215. years (besides women, children, and potent people) how much more is it likely, that so soon after time the Flood the children of Noah might, in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the Earth: What strength this Answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Isaak were 70. and had 215. years time: and the Sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. years of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and S. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phaleg's death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was, by more likely computation, 12. years before his birth) then was the division 38. years after Ninive, who governed 52. years: in the 42. year of whose Reign Abraham was born. But when Ninur began to rule the Affrians, 80. years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebr. in brew, Hieron and Christoph) then was the Earth so peopled in all the East & Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Ninur, associating to himself Ariam King of Arabia, a People who at that time (saith Diodorus Siculus) plurimum gibus aggre armis prefabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia: received Berzans into grace: then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children: vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanis, the Egyptians, Phenicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Perfia, to the Ithyrcanian Sea. For the number which followed Ninur (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and and Zoraster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000 prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill fatished with their portions, as they fought to be masters of all; and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this Opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit, that if the division had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers born to fill the Earth: It was never meant that the Earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely, whatsoever mens Opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the division of Tongues and of Men must go near together with the scaling of the work of Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101. after the Flood, which was the year Nimrod came into Shinar, or ten years after he arrived, faith Berghus.

Now, if it be objected, That Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth Division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this Objection, it may be answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures; for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Ejau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this division, had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrews, Saint Hierom, and Chrysostom, account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed: to this I say, I do not find that Heber deferred any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his Son: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the Building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

§. IV.

Of the sons of Jochan, the other Son of Heber.

1. Elnodad.
2. Salaph, or Salep, or Shelaph.
3. Asiamath, or Chuscar.
4. Jare, or Jarah, or Jerath.
5. Hadarnam.
6. Uzal, or Uzal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Suba.
11. Ophir, or Opis.
12. Havilah, or Chavila, and
13. Jabab.

All those Sons of Jochan (according to Saint Hierom) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Opis or Chuscar, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general: And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Seper a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the Sons of Chusab, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Seba, or Sheba, his Grandchild by his wife Keturah. But Seba the Son of Chusab, and Sheba the Son of Rhegna his Nephew we have left in Arabia felix; and Havilah the Son of Chusab upon Tygris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Perfia; of which Nations Dionysius of Orbis sua maketh mention: Primum Sabei; post hoc sunt Passagardi; prope vero hos sunt Tacti: The first are Sabeans; after these be Passagardi; and near these the Tacti. And whereas it is written; But unto the Sons of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country: Hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandered into Perfia: for Perfia was accounted the furthestmost East-Country in respect of Judea; which also Ovid letteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's Sons scated themselves on the borders of Judea:

I rather choose to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Ptolemy letteth a City of that name.

But Saba, the Son of Jochan, the Son of Heber (as I conceive) inhabited India it self. For Dionysius Affir in his Periegesis (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabei. Taxilis his inter medius habitaque Sabeus. In the middle of these dwell the Sabei, and the Taxili, faith Dionysius.

§. V.

§. V.

Of Ophir one of Jochan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

Ophir also was an inhabitant of the East India, (and as St. Hierom underlands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with Gold, which are now known by the name of Molucca. Josephus underlands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chesterm, or Pentisulae: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as St. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the head-land of Molucca. But Ophir is found among the Molucca farther East.

Arian Montanus, out of the second of Chronicler, the third Chapter and 6th Verse, gathers, that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words, in the second of the Chronicler, are these: And he over-layed the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold of Parauain. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Charasene, a Province of Susiana, called Bartais so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parauain: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him, and which David preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus and Plessir, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this Question may be a subject of no further dispute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least, America hath none, no not any City, Village or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atahualpa commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards, utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand toward a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the Diurnal of their enterprize, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama, had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assure me; which also Aquila the Italian in his natural and moral History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jochan, who as he supposed navigated from the utmost East of India or America: it is most true, that Jucatan is nothing else in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Jucatan (which is) What ask you, or What say you? The like happened touching Paria, a Mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountains. For at Paria begin that marvellous ledg of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The fame happened among the English, which I sent under Sir Richard Greenville to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages answered, Wingandason, which is as much to say, as, Thou wear good cloaths, or gay cloath. The name happened to the Spaniards in asking the name of the Island Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that fell place which the Sea encompasseth, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner have many places, newly discovered, been entituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Molucca, whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now, although there may be found Gold in Arabia it self (towards Perfia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all along that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up at the Philippines, certain Indias planted by the Spaniards, from the East Indias. And by the length of the passage which Solomon's Ships made from the Red-Sea (which was three years in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Molucca or Philippines. Indeed these that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two years, and sometimes less: and Solomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the compass was known, it was impossible to navigate a-thwart the Ocean; and therefore Solomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the East India Islands, far above the Mines of any one place of America) to sail every year to the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they built a City called Manilla. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those days, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Testatus also gathereth a fantastical Opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose Mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountains Salinus affirmed to be in Synthia Asia, in these words: *Nam cum Anro & Gemmis affuant, Griffes tenent universa, aliter ferocissime, Arimapsi cum his dominantur. Et per ubi ubi sunt Country: abund in Gold and rich Stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kind of Beast, the fiercest of all other, with which Griffins a Nation of people, called Arimapsi, make War. These Arimapsi be said to have been men with one eye only, like unto the Cyclops of Scythia: of which Cyclops, Heraclitus, and Aristem make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Cook: and Valerius Flaccus in D. Scythia, in the Story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own Opinion) I believe none of Dionysius them. And for these Arimapsi, I take it that this Scythia, name signifying one-eyed, was first given them, for reason that they used to wear a vizard of defence, with one fight in the middle to serve both eyes; and* and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Salinus borroweth these things out of Phygy, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gylstron, or the Cave of the North-east wind. For the rest, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon some true Stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for Gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of half their eye-sight (at least of that eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with equities and moderate estate, and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt air, and violent heat and cold, and to all sorts of miserable difficulties. And though this Fable be feigned in this place, yet, if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains, which are very rich, and full of Gold. Inhabited only with Tigers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beasts: unto which, if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same war which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the Gold, or feck to defend that metal, but being diquicted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow enraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said, that the Allegories (which the Egyptians call the Crocodiles) defend those Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the In-land: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Allegories know not the Pearl, yet they find favour in the flesh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

¶. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joſtan, who also passed into the East-Indies: and of Melha and Scipher named in the vordering of the families of Joſtan: with a Conclusion of this Discourse touching the Plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joſtan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general Opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East-Indies, in the Continent, from which Ophir pass into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Gogier is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East-India, which took name of Havilah the Son of Joſtan: but Havilah which Pifon compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the Son of Chus, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul fuisse the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But, that Saul ever made war in the East-India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joſtan, twelve three, Saba, Havilah, and Ophir: though at the first rated by their Brethren about the Hill Ardius, or Mis, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) between Chus and Mesopotamia: yet, at length, either themselves, or their issues removed into the East-Indies, leaving the other Families of Jafan, to fill the Countries of their first plantations: which the Scripture declines to have been from Mis unto Scipher. And although S. Hierome take Mis to be a Region of the East-Indies, and Scipher a Mountain of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those Families are far beyond my understanding. For, the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than unto Perſia. But Mis is that part of the Mountain of Mafus in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth, which runneth by Characa: and in the same Region we also find Scipher (remembered by Mosier) Siphara by Polemy, standing to the East of the Mountain Mafus, from whence, Jofian having many Sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

The other fashion of Planting Underſtand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture, where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 23. Balaac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the East: which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia (witness this place of Deuteronomy: Because they hired Balaam the Son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram) Niharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Niharajim was Syria fuvierum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the Flood doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or modern. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factious and bickering Historians of all Ages (especially of these later Times) have, by their many Volumes of untrue reports, left Honour without a Monument, and Virtue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkeſt forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and diffolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first Planters after the Flood (I mean all the footstepes of Antiquity (as appears by what hath been spoken) are not quite worn out, nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the found of Babel; Phoenicia hath Zidon; so hath Cilicia, Tharſis; the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signs of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Beginning and Establishment of Government.

SECT. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of the families to be Regal, and from Regal absolute, to Regal tempered with Laws.

I T followeth now, to intreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had society of people) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was always used, both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and gravity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For, in the Eleventh of Numbers, God commanded Mosier to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Governors over them: the Hebrew bearing the same fence which the Latine word Senex, or Senior doth. So it is written in Sofonias, Then the Assembly believed them at those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and Witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the Office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Latcedemonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerant, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur, Senes; Among the Lacedemonians, the chief Magistrates, as they were, so they are called, Eldermen: And again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellassent Senatus; If reason and judgement were not in old men, our Ancestors had never called the highest Council by the name of Senate.

But, though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not, but in this name of (Elders) for Governors, or Counsellours of State, there is a sign that the first Governments were the Fathers of Families: and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard, take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seigneurie) for Lordship: puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kinds of this Seigneurie, Seneca makes two: The one, Patris aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietatis aut dominium, Propriety or mastery-ship. The correlative to the one is the Subject; of the other, the Slave. Ad Celsorem (saith he) possess omnium pertinet; ad singulos proprietatis; Caesar hath power over all, and every man propriety in his own: And again, Caesar omnia imperio possidet, singulis dominio; Caesar holdeth all in his power, and every man possideth his own. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience (the first of natural reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth,) being exceedingly overshadowed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of Paternal persuasions (after man-kind began to neglect and forget the Original and first giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to relist the first inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to contain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were only guided and steered by their own fancies, and tolt to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while Wildom was severed from power and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wife and foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a general flood of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to Order and Dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of offences) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. Insumuch, that the licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved, upon a better trial, no less perillous than indurable bondage.

These Arguments, by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the charge (which brought with it less evil, than the former mischief) was generally pleased: so time (making all men wife that observe it) found some improvement and corrective in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved, Sovereign power; brought it self to certain equal rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of Laws, private affections in supreme Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Balance, both good and evil.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant. The people were not governed by any other Laws than the wills of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those men's Virtues value them which were not fanced by their Kings, nor those men's Vices deform them that were. Amor interdu nimis videt, interdum nihil videt: Love sees one while too much, another while stark nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few years (for direction and restraint of Royal power) Laws were established:

blished : and that Government which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even Balance supreme power and common right) acquired the Title of Regal : the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical : the one, God established in favour of his people ; the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regal Authority, Princes as they were chosen for their Virtues only, so did they measure their powers by a great deal of moderation. And therefore (saith Kabus Pitar) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dei & dediti; Princes because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity ; yet it was God himself that first kindled this light in the minds of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor : God himself by his Eternal providence having ordained Kings ; and the Law of Nature, Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince ; the Deer their Leaders ; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their own safety. The most high beards rule over the Kingdoms of Men ; and appointeth war it whomsoever he pleases. By me (saith Wisdom), spoken by the Son of God.) Kings reign ; By me Princes rule, And it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Christ himself witnesseth, speaking to Pilate, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath been Governed from the beginning (to wit) by a Justice natural ; by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephews, and Families ; in which government the Obedience was called natural Duty ; Again, by a Justice divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God ; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience : And lastly, by a Justice civil, begotten by both the former ; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three, those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in general was Paternal, it is most evident : for Adam, being Lord over his own Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator ; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

SECT. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites ; and of the degrees of humane society.

What other Policy was exercised, or State founded, after such time as man-kind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot be certainly known, though it seem by probable conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age : It being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the general Flood ; and very likely, that the cruel Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some Tyranny in Government, or some rougher form of Rule, than the Paternal.

Berosus ascribeth the Rule of the World in those days to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastered (saith

he) all Nations from the Sun-rising, to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and three several times as the rule of Eldership failed, three several forms of Government were in several times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

The first, most Ancient, most general, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Laws, called Moharchy ; to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or observation of the Laws of God, or Men. For a lawful Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity ; and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the Rule of Gods Words : Judges and Officers shall thou make thee in thy Cities : and they shall judge the people with righteous judgment.

The second Government, is of divers persons called Aristocracy, or Optimatum potestas ; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great ones) is opposed : as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democracy, to which is opposed Ochlokratia, or the Turbulent unjust ruling of the multitude ; and the like. The second Government, is of divers persons called Aristocracy, or Optimatum potestas ; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great ones) is opposed : as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

Now as touching the beginning and order of Policy since the second increase of mankind, I follow the history in this sort : First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Laws to his own issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many households (Man by nature, loving society) joining their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vici ; of the Greek κωμ, which signifies a Houſe ; or of the word (Vix) because it hath divers ways and paths leading to it. And as the first Houſe grew into a Village, so the Village into a City ; so called of the Greeks πολις which signifies a Fountain : because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) drank of one Spring or Stream of Water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires, answereth not unfailly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride, between the Race of the one and the other, daily increased : so both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to joyn and set together divers of their Villages, inventing them first with Banks and Ditches, and afterwards with Walls : which, being so compassed, were then called Oppida ; either ab opponendo se hostibus, Because Walls were opposed against Enemies ; or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence : as also they were called Urbes, ab orbe ; because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortify. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signifieth no other than the very Walls, and Buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein : so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudo civit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within in these Walls are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men : who bearing proportionally the charge of the City, may by turns become Officers and Magistrates thereof : the rest go under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same general name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen : perhaps also some Citizen (as the chief Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject ; but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken à Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greek word (Μεγιστην) and so the Greek call them Μεγισταν, whom the Latins call Magistratus, or Magistratus.

The Office and Duty of every Magistrate, Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity ; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresseth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their Duties and Office. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth ; but if thou do evil, fear : for he beareth not the sword for naught. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in the same place ; That every soul ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountain thereof : and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgement and condemnation of Man, but of God : For every man shall be judged (saith he) not because of verily only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbered of Gods punishments, upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty : for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a Tyrannous hand ; and the Commandment of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himself subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be given unto him : and he paid Tribute for himself and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech ; and Jacob blessed the King of Egypt : And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in Authority : and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostom, in his Homily to the people, prefer Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting : Prefat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum ; Better a Tyrannous King, than no King ; to which also Tacitus subscribeth : Prefat (saith Tacitus) in the first of his History) sub male principe esse, quam nullo. It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them : Nepos enim libertatis turis vult esse (saith Claudian) quam Domitio ferre bono ; No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the virtuous. And certainly, howsoever it may be disputed, yet it is safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000 Tyrants : under a wife man that is cruel, than under the foolish and Barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta, that desired an alteration of Government, That kind of Rule which a man would disdain in his own house, were very unfit to govern great Kingdoms by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erect many Cottages for their many Children ; and as (for the reason before remembered) many Households joyned themselves together, and made Villages ; many Villages made Cities ; so when these Cities and Citizens joyned together, and established Laws by consent, associating themselves under one Governour, and Government ; they, so joyned, were called a Commonwealth : the same being sometimes governed by Kings ; sometimes by Magistrates ; sometimes by the People themselves.

SECT. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and Families became strong, and they dispersed into several parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden : Ambition and Covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the bloom and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure : they erected no other magnificent Buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest ; they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintain life : nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the Cold, the Rain and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those Elder times ; but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the time may be attributed more to any one time than to another (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages : and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the Infancy of Empire (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only work to obedience) might be called the Golden Age ; may the beginning of all Princes times be truly be called Golden. For be it that men affect Honour, it is then best purchased ; or if Honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least Impediments : and if Liberty overthrow her Banks and Bounds, the same is then best warranted both by Policy and Example. But Age and Time, do not only harden and thicken the openest and most jovial hearts, but the Experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torn Estates before their eyes, and (withal) perfwadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose means are answerable unto other mens desires ; yet such as value all things by their own respects, do not sooner find their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the Times injurious and Iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his days be many : for our younger years are our Golden Age, which being eaten up by time, we praise those Seasons which our youth accompanied : and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and difeases which never part from us but at the grave, make the time seem to differing and displeasing : especially the quality of Man's nature being also such, as it doth reth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present : state how just soever : Fis humane malignitatis vizio, ut semper veteri in laude, presentia in fastidio sint ; It comes to pass (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we always extol the time past, and hold the present fastidious. For it is one of the Errors of wayward Age : Quod sint Landatores temporis alii ; That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this advice of Solomon : Say not then, Why is it that the former days were better than these ? For thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing : to which purpose Seneca : Majores nostri quæsi sunt, & nos querimus, posteri querentur, everest affe mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi : Our Ancestors have complained, we do complain, our Children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. There are usually the Discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Anobis. Nova res quandoque vetus fieri, & vetus temporibus, quibus cepit nova sunt & repentina. Whatsoever is new in time shall be made old : and the ancientest things when they look beginning were also new and sudden. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentment of present times have made Golden, this we may set down for certain, That as it was the virtue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns ; so the love of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes : so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects ; having respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but even to the mean-ty of his Creatures : Namque particulari bono servit omne homin ; The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only : For he that made the first and greatest, careth for all alike : and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs ; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience : For, Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum : All humane power is rooted in the will or disposition of men.

SECT. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility : and of the vain vaunt thereof without Virtue.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly Authority, began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen : unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which Employments and Offices sprang those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age, to these days. But this Nobility, or difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Blood, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers : and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excel, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet heretofore had Nobility denomination in the beginning. That such as excelled others in virtue, were so called : Hinc dicta Nobilitas, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Jerom judged of the Succession in this manner : *Nobilitas aliud videtur in Nobilitate appendunt, nisi quod Nobiles quidam necessitate contringuntur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent ; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For it Nobility be Virtus & antique divitiæ ; Virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise dechne Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth decline a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Pius) be a witness of virtue and well-doing ; and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Virtue in a Race or Linage : then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Papers, which ignorant men worship instead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints : men in whom there remain but the dregs and Vices of ancient Virtue ; Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of Soyl and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foul, filthy, and deiled ? Ex terra sterili produciuntur signanda decata venientia, ex terra sterili pretiosum Aurum ; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poisoning Herbs, and out of barren Soyl precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobility : the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weal. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publique Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being defended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Author calleth personal (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also Personal ; yet if Virtue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility, by many degrees to be preferred : For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such an one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility, which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour : and these be indeed but Honours of affection, with which Kings, with the change of their Fancies, with they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely, if we had as much fence of our delectation in worthiness, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Virtue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Posthume body and barren mind ? For (according to the same Father) *Dele faciem fugacis honoris hujus, & male coronate nitentem glorie, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly : for thou comest naked out of thy Mothers womb, comest thou thence with thy Myre, or glittering with Jewels, or gentry.

garished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or fluffed with Gold : If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration, as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked ; and weeping, because he is born ; and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between the old and dult : which if thou dost not believe (saith St. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily persuade thee by their own example, that thou art dult and dult : so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than thou.

iffid than dost, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade
Of virtuous life ; not in the fleshly Line :
For blood is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And howsoever the custom of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by birth upon unworthy Issues : yet Solomon (as wife as any King) reprehendeth the fame in his fellow-Princes : There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth : Folly is set in great excellency.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

SECT. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Sovereign Lord, and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THE first of all that reigned as Sovereign Lord, after the Flood, was Nimrod, the Son of Chush, distinguished by Meser from the rest (according to St. Augustine) in one of these two respects : either for his crinency, and because he was the first of fame, and took on him to command others : or else, in that he was begotten by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers ; and of a later time than some of his Grandchildren and Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Meser in express words, calleth Nimrod the Son of Chush, other men conjectures to the contrary, ought to have no respect.

This Empery of Nimrod, both the Fathers, and many later Writers call tyrannical : the fame beginning in Babel (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me, that Melancthon conceived not ariseth hereof : the fame exposition being also made by the Author of that Work, called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter, or severe Governor, because his form of Rule seemed, at first, far more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore he is in this respect also called A mighty Hunter, because he took and destroyed both beasts and thieves. But St. Augustine underlands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter against God : Sic ergo intelligendus est Cigna ille, Venator contra Dominum. So it that Giants to be understood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (A mighty Hunter) be understood ; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those which went with him from the East into Skinaar : so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himself, or any of the Sons of his own body, came with this troop into Babylon : no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews ; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The fame is also confirmed by divers Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Jethan, were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so far as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Son's Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southernmost parts of Chaldaea, about the City of Ur, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldaea, were no partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower : therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) they did retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah's ; and Noah to Sem and his Issues : In familia Heber remansit hæc lingua ; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith Saint Augustine) out of Epiphanius) and this Language Abraham used ; yea, it was anciently, and before the Flood, the general speech : and therefore first called (saith Callestime) lingua humana : the humane tongue.

We know that Goroips Becaus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moser, Egyptians, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion ; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly feed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely, that that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than violence of usurpation.

SECT.

SECT. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct Persons.

BEnze, and out of him Naclerus, with others, make many Nimrds; Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hieron upon Os; and these words of Saint Augustine seem to make him of the same Opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus ille regnaverat 65. annos: There did Ninus reign after the death of his father Belus, who governed in Babylon fifty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein, For the beginning of Nimrds Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erce, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly, it becometh with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus his time, the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus ille regnaverat), who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Caesar overthrow the liberty of the Roman Common-wealth, making himself perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first established Emperour, and the first that reigned absolutely by sovereign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of sovereign rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with general allowance, exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them, both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. years after the Flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For, to Edward the third, and his Grand-child, Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For, it is plain, that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining; but the first, and most famous work of Ninus, was the City of Ninive.

Now, whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

—Dictum altum

Cotillius muris cinxisset Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with walls of Brick, the City did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Justin hath the fame of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's Arguments; it may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For, if we may believe Justin; then were Vesprior King of Egypt and Tanais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them.

For, whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early, for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erce, Accad, and Chalne; which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one Person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true. That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the Flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts; and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hand.

Besides, whereas these Cities, in many mens Opinions, are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Acad, which the Septuagint calls Archad; and Epiphanius, Arpal; Justin takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia; for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Acadene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive, to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charraz, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charraz, are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arius Montanus, out of S. Hieron, calls Acad; and so do the Hebræans also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Oreg; and Paginus, Erec; this place Justin understandeth for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Camagena, called Arace: and indeed, likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalde) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Mercellinus, S. Hieron takes it for Selenia; Hieronymianus, L. 23. Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrate, destroyed and raised by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this Dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not fenced in to divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erce, Accad, and Chalne in the Land of Shinaar; so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think, with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguishing Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) cap. 6. v. 20. to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneva Translation, favouring the former Opinion, to let these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these Cities were therein fenced, but to distinguish Babylon of Chalde, from Babylon in Egypt; but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City; but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrate. Now, that Chalde is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

SECT. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive; and that it is probable, out of Ezay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOW, as of Nimrod; so are the Opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Assyria: a controversee wearisomely disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the Interpretation of Justin is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not disjoin the fence of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium Regni rui Babel, & Erce, & Accad, & Chalne, in terra Shinaaris: de terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi edificavit Ninive (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erce, and Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Justin takes Assur in this place, not for any Person, but for the Region of Assyria, the Land being so called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the Son of Shem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For, in the beginning of the tenth Chapter, he setteth down the Sons of Noah, in these words: Now these are the generations of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately, The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest, because he was first to be spoken of; with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and setteth down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons; first, the Issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after, he numbeth the Sons of Ham, of which Chush and Mizraim; and afterwards of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disjoin the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Sela, and Heber, unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Sons of Shem, in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have pait over to slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire in one of the Sons of Shem, if he had had any such means: it being the Story of Shem's Sons which he most attended. For he named Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sons of Chush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter, he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the Issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Isaac. And of Justin opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive P. Comfior, in his Historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who, after he had delivered this place in four or five senses, he useth these words: Vel intelligendum est de Assur, filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est, Regum Assyriorum) nunc expressum est, quod tempore Sarug patris Abrahami factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the Son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcilith the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the Son of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Nierbergius, Saint Hieron, and Cyrillus, and now lastly, Tornielius: who (saith he) took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did Africans, after his Conquest in Africa; and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psal. 81. Ezay. 10. Os. 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the Son of Irari. But Kabanas Marturi, who was Arch-Bishop of Mezenc in the year of Christ 854. an Ancient and Learned Writer, understandeth this place with Comfior, or Comfior with him, agreeing in substance with that Translation of Justin: to which words of Moses he giveth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pululavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli, filii, Ninus condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary, Calvin objecteth this place of Ezay: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversity in the Translation and Understanding, in so much as Michael de Palatio upon Ezay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the State of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur, rather than Nimrod, established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former Translation of Justin, and his own Opinion. Now, out of the Vulgar (called Hieron's Trans-

Translation) it may be gathered, that Affur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans; by Ely remembered unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrans, that they cannot trust or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phoenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which City of Chaldea, being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Affyrans utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also from after be overturned by the same Affyrans: as (indeed) it was by Nebuchodonosor. And there be the words after Hierom: Ece terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Affur fundavit eam, in capivitatem tradiderunt robigulos ejus, suffuderunt domus ejus, piserunt eam in ruinam (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a People there were not (or, this was no People, after the Genes) Affur (or the Affyrans) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their Houses, and ruined their City. The Spirituus expels it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldeorum, ob hac desolata (it is Affyrans, quoniam munus ejus corrumpit, making the fence perfect by the preceding verse, which altogether may be thus understood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedonia, or Greece) yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrans) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans; for this it made desolate by the Affyrans, because their Wall, fell together to the ground, Pagani and Vatubab convertit thus: Ece terra Chaldeorum, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Affur fundavit eam maxibus, everterunt aces illius, contrivierunt edes ejus, piserunt eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Affur built it a harbour for Ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and again brake down the Houses thereof, and ruined it. Junius, in the place of Ships, sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Genes, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubtedly, that the Prophet Ely (as may be gathered by all the fence of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrans of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatness of the Tyrans was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis, from the Macedonians, and other Grecians, under the name of Citizens also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the Arabians. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our Discourse of Paradise) notwithstanding that the chief merchandize came in by the City Uz, or Ubia in Chaldea, where the body or chief stream of Emphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon and Orus, which now falleth into Tyre) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be flopped up. For, as we have heretofore noted, the Arabians (that descended from Shel and Rasamab) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrans (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chaldea did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tyre, that is, from Teredon and of Emphrates, that is, from Uz, or Ubia: and then by Uz, and thence by River and over Land, they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre as they do this day to Affys. So then Uz of the Chaldeans was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, trade, and exchange with the Tyrans: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which, that part of Emphrates ran, which passage is now flopped up. Ihus cursum ventis absterit (with Niger), And Pliny: Locus ubi Emphrates ostium fuit, flumen affuit, Time habet mare (the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water). These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldeans, whose calamities Ely here noteth for terror of the Tyrans, to be the City anciently called Uz, and by Hecateus, Camirina, by Psolony, Urbos; and by the Greeks, Chalcedoni, the City of Chaldea: which the Sons of Shem, unto Abrahams time, inhabited. And whereas, in all the Translations, it is said, that Affur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Affur the Founder was the Son of Shem, and Affur the destroyers were the Affyrans, by whom those that inhabited Uz of Chaldea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carraun, and to Conan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatubab & Pagani converted (by Ships) do bear this sense, the same may be the better approved, because it was a Port Town; and the River so far up as this City of Uz was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no less manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next People of all other unto it. For Chaldea is now called Aracabdar, which signifieth Desert Land; because it joyneth to that part of Arabia so called; and Gieru (calling those Arabians by the name of Jureans) addeth, that they are, of all other People, the most Savage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Ely, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary Opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former Translation of Junius, nor the Interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Affur is in this place diversely taken (as for the Son of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Uz; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Affyrans Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seem to enforce it. And to this foundation of the City of the Chaldeans by Affur (into which the most of the Posterity of Shem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatry of the Chabites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove the same Affur built Nineve, or that the same Affur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Affur, who was the Son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the Son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now, if Affur must be of that Race, and not of the Family of Shem, as he must be, if he founded Nineve; then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Affur, whom they make the Founder of Nineve (and so the Son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly, he was very unworthy, and obscure, and not like to be the Founder der of such an Empire, and such a City, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to Posterity his explanation thence, and how he lost that Empire again, or quitted it to Ninus: whose Acts and Conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the Story of that Age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalae, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the same stream that Babel and Chalae did: which work his Grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundress of the City which the only finished; so also Ninus of Nineve: Quam quidam Babylonem posuit instaurare; She might repair or renew Babylon, faith St. Augustine. For so did Nebuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the Wall, over-born by the fury of the River: which work of his stood till Alexander's time, whereupon he vaunted thus: It not this great Babel which I have built?

SECT. IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the Story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transgression, and Julius Africanus surnamed Saturus) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchy, of whom there is no thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembered; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalae; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affria, and in Affria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rebobs, Celab, and Refcin. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it self, and those adjoining; and that his travels were many ere he came into Shinaar: that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Affria which he builded (considered with the want of Materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of People's and their examples and Patterns of his beginning, to great advancement and encouragement: in whose time (faith Glycor) all these Nations were called Merope, a firmis linguarum terrarumque divisione; By reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 years; of whose Acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm ground of all those great Fens and overflown Marshes which adjoynd unto it. For any of his Wars or Conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia, which Berojus calls Scythia Sages, whose Son and Successor

Baranes became Subject and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the War to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

SECT. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia.

THAT so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod (as by the Story of Ninus is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity, being a Prince's liberal and powerful, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Willom ought, by whose presence alone the understanding minds of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for; so as every Leader of a Troop (after the division of Tongues, and dispersion of People) finding these fair offers made unto them, held the power which they possessed, and governed by discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their destined places. For, it cannot be conceived, that when the earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like Beasts in a Desert, but that by agreement they disposed themselves, and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus his time, would not have been peopled in many hundreds of years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (order being the true Parent of prosperous success) undertake so difficult enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod, with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity relieved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their own Travels; nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence; nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these Causes had wrought these Effects, the undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent; for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no Companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Sovereignty and sole Commandment of all those the Children of Nash, which came from the East into Babylonia; though in his life-time others also raised themselves to the same estate of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia sufficiently powerful to resist his attempts; which Sabatus, I take to be the same, which Justin calls Tanis; and should conjecture, that Misiram had been this Vex. See more of this first error as Justin placeth him) in the time of that part, Vexoris, who by many circumstances seems to me, Sutia.

rightly accounted by the Judicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Sesfthir, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 years, according to the common account.

SECT. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affixed unto it.

WHENCE this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bell, or Belus, question hath been made; for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus, Archeus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himself to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence derived. But Bell, as many Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean Princes and Babylonian Sarape; so was it used by the chief of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those voices of Baal, Basim, Belphegor, Belphegar, Belsibub, and Belphephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean, convert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps Militiæ, Chief in the War; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum; In honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierom makes Bel, Bel, and Basal, to have the same signification: and saith, That the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped; to which, that he might add the more honour and reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lycanus) it came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the world. Hydrot doth interpret Belly Virus, old, or ancient; adding, That as among the Affrians it is taken for Satur, and the Suns, so in the Punic or Carthaginian Language, it signifieth God: Glycas maketh an Affrian name properly; & Josephus a Tyriz. He also affirmeth, That the Idol w^{ch} the Mozabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountain Peper, or Peor, & called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Præputis, the god of Gardens; which also was the Opinion of Saint Hierom. But, that the word Bel, or Belus, was as much to say, as God, appeareth by the word Belsibub, the Idol of Acarnum. For Bel, or Bel, (saith Guendeth) God and Serub (Flies or Hornets) by which name (notwithstanding) the Jews express the Prince of Devils, But the Prophet Isa teacheth us the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himself; And at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ilthi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouth. For, although the name of Baal, or Babal, be justly to be used towards God; yet in respect that the same was given to Idols, God hath hated it, and forbade it. And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sun, was not, because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sun there was worshipped as God; as also the Fire was tantum Sols particula. As for the words compounded (before remembered) as Belphegor, and Belphephon; Belphephon is expounded out of Pacius; Dominus Phalx, vel castris: The Lord of the IPatch-tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is written Belphe, or Belphepon; and Peor (they say) is as much as Demidari; and therefore the word joyned, expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Satur: for it was used among the Ancients, to name the Father Satur, the Son Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Satur discuntur fami, equituli. lium Nobilium, Regumque qui ubi condiderunt seffim; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero Nepotes eorum fortissimi. The ancestors of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturs; their first-born Jupiters and Junones; and their valiant Nephews, Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Viter) was famous for his Warlike Son Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by Dreams of their Antiquities) make one of theirs. For Neptune (saith Virgilius) upon Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus, begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Ægyptus. They add, That this Belus, carrying a Colony to the River Euphrates, there built a City, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But there were any Belus the Son of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Lybia, or (with Enfubius) of Tegulus, who after the death of Alys married Isis (Cætop) then reigning in Athens: the fame was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speak; but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians too much vaunted.

SECT. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images, begunn from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Astronomy, if Pliny say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the fame Author affirmeth, that it did remain in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Græcili Over the River, saith he, there are Gardens, where they say the ruines of Belus his Tomb, which Serxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Brick, a furlong high, and on every side it had a furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril against Julian, that he obtained divine worship yet living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbeus) Arbeus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à Juidis Deitatis nomen accipisse; Perseveravit igitur Affriis & finissime illi gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbeus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men, that was ever honoured by their Subjects with stike of Deity, (or with the name of God) the Affrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persecuted, sacrificing to him. Even Arinus also, whom Suidas calls Thurax, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an Idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninias) Thurax reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of

of the Planet Mars; a man of sharp and fierce disposition, who bidding battle to Caucasus, of the stock of Japheth, slew him. The Affrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is Mars; thus far Suidas). Neither is it unlikely but that among Idolatrous Nations were Deified in their life-times, or soon after: though I deny not, but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without divine worship, only in the memory of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterwards the Devil crept into those wooden & brazen Caskets, when Deity had lost the memory of their first invention. Hereof Hydrot speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deus affertur, homines fuerunt, & pro naturæ suæ virtute, vel magnificentiâ, coluntur; post mortem caperunt: sed (Dæmonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro suis meritis honoraverunt, minores Deus existimant: ad ipsa vero magis excolenda, acceperunt Potentum signata. They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for their merits or magnificence, began after his death to be honoured of his own: But, at length (the Devil persuading) they accounted them after gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the Opinions concerning the honour of the dead much more superstitious.

And, that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans and Heathen Nations, it is not Hydrot alone that witnesseth, but Gregory; Genitilis (saith he) inventrix & caput est Imaginum: Genitilis is the Inventress and source of Images; and Ambrige, Genites lignum adorant, tanquam Imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adored wood, as it were the Image of God. Enfubius also affirmeth as much, and callet the worshipping of Images, a Custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like faith Saint Augustine against Ambrosius. En ventur (saith Lactantius) ne Religio vana sit, finit videntur quod adorant. They fear these Religion would be vain, should they not see what they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolmen think this fearful custom very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian fastidist it felt with the distinction of Doulas, and Hyperdoulas, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should strive their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practicers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted as neither the express Commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatening of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any persuasions lead the hearts of men from it. For, where shall we find words of greater weight, or plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the Book that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves; and make you a graven Image, or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Males or Females.

And, besides the express Commandment, Thou shalt not make thee any graven Image, and the prohibition of many Scriptures; so it is written in the Book of Wisdom, That, the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolmen affirm, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest, that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal, and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil, Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumferas cum mente tua: Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a proclamation unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do those men presum; that put him under the great Piece of a Painter, or the rusty Ax or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God, began in Babel; so did the Devil transport and spread this invention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans, for a while, resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to let them in their Temples for 170 years; observing the Law of Nema, who thought it impious to resemble things most beautiful, by things most base. But, Targuinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a Nation of all others under the Sun most deluded by Satan) set up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varron both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth: Simulachra deorum venerantur, illi supplicat, genus populi illa adorant; & cum læs supplicat, fibros, qui illa fecere, contemnunt. The Images of the gods are worshipped, they they pray unto, with bended knees; they adore; and while they so greatly admire them, they contemn the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at:

Hec miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sensuque Religiosa sibi sculptant simulachra, seuque Patrem fingunt, & que fecere, venerant!
Quis furor est? que tanta animos domum? ludi?
Uti voluerunt, sursumque bovem, torumque Draconem.
Sem-hominemque canem supplex homo prostrat adorat.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities, And consecrate dumb Idols in their heart, Who their own Maker (God on high) despise, And fear the work of their own hands and Art! What fury? what great madness doth beguile Mens minds? that man should ugly things adore Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Half-dog-half-man on knees for him to prostrate.

And though this device was barbarous, and stiff, and many years practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laughed to scorn the ignorant stupidity of his Nation: but Justin Martyr remembreth how the Sybil inveighed against Images: and Hippolitus, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the Souls of men to erect and adore those labels. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Perfians did not erect or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycargus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impious to represent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Enfubius also witnesseth, in his Sixth Book, de preparatione Evangelicæ, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serice, or among the Brachman in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might be remembered, that witness the diffin which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatry; of which Hippolytus hath written at large in his Tract, de origine Imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla hominum initiis orta sunt. Alii exempla habere sprung from good beginning. The Heathen, at first, made these Statues and Images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved both of their Countries and Common-wealths: Efficies hominum (saith Pliny) non solum exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuaretur merentium: Men are not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered.

And though of the more ancient Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis litterarum, ut per ea difformis hominum Deum ineffabilem effigere: Images, say they, Cad and forbore them the Heathen (said) are in stead of Letters, where, by men might learn to know the invisible God: in that understanding, perhaps, they no other ways esteemed them than Pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal, or Bol, set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most revered Idol of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away; so those very Rocks and Stones, and painted canvases (called the Pictures of Christ, our Lady, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not only adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these Rocks we call (saith the Book of Wisdom) when we pass through the raging water, on these Rocks we rest: then the Ship that carries us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dii consentes, seu majorem gentium, scilicet, Patrii, insigneiores, dii minores: Consulting gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobility, scilicet gods, Patrii, gods of mark, and Common gods (which the Romans called Medioxum) *diu infirmi, and terrestrial Heroes, and multitudes of other gods, of which S. Augustine hath made large mention, in his Book, de Civitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all these miserable souls, and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which flood with the same title and dedication, even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devil had for many years led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them, as *Jupiter in Crete, Jove in Egypt, in Athens, Minerva in Samos, Venus in Cyprus, Venus, and of all other parts; but every City, and almost every Family, had a god apart. For, as it is written in the second of Kings, the men of Babel made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asima, and the A. vites made Nibhaz and Tartak, and the Sepharvaim burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech, All which, how plainly hath the Prophet Ezechiel riden? Men cut down Trees, rind them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath sent them from sight, and their heart from understanding. It is therefore fittest for a Christian, to believe the Commandments of God, to direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul, who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flee from Idolatry; I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

SECT. VIII.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and lastly, of his Wars against Zoroaster.

UNTO this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his Neighbour Princes, and the first that, without shame or fear, committed Adultery in publick. But, as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of profane Authors) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the fame may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For, although that piece of Berosus, set out and commented upon by Ammius, hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Corycæus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassus, and others; yet, Lodovicus Vivæ, B. Roberus, and others after them, have laid open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment proving directly, that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexander's time, cited by Athenæus and Josephus; and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Ninrod, to the eighteenth King Asiatades, and to the times of Josiah. For of Metaphyses an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers; or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but the afterwards, in the collection of the Persian Kings, is not without his errors.

Cyrenus, or Caidus (a City joyning to Halicarnassus) who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Monius, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reached as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and, though in the Story of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias, and Terentian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the Times and Princes with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his Works, leaving some very few exceptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can express them. S. Augustine affirms, that Ninus mastered all Asia. Angeline excepted. Others say that he was it all, save India, Babylonia, and Arabia. For he made Armenia of Arabia, the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entered into a freight league of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and and a Chusite and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the sudden, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Ariacus (which bordered Syria) afflicted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his War against Zoroaster: for from Armenia, he bent himself that way toward the East; but, that ever he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not believe, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third War was against Pharus, King of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seven Children; though others affirm, that they all died in one battle against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is said, that he made two Expeditions into Babylonia: and, that finding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and set the work of Ninive forward: and then a second time entered Babylonia with 1700000 Foot, and 200000 Horse, and 100000 fix hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaster with four hundred thousand. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster being slain, he entered farther into the Country, and besieged the chief City thereof, called Babylonia, or Babylon (saith Strabo) which by a passage found, and an assault given by Semiramis (the Wife of Meneus) he entered and possessed. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external beauty, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he took her from her Husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out, if he refused to consent. He therefore yielding to the passion of love in Ninive, and to the passion of sorrow in himself, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, cast himself headlong into the Water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

SECT. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventor of Astrologic, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster, King of the Babylonians, Vincennes supposed to be Cham the Son of Noah: a fancy of little probability. For Cham was the Paternal Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincennes had heard of that Book which was called Scriptura Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and so entitled; of which Sextus Senefius hath made the due mentions.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham the Son of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholastical History; which Art (saith he) with the seven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: seven of which were made of Brass, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Flood; and seven of Brick, against the injury of fire. There was also another devised Discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham, Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (saith Noah) qui superstitionibus suis et sacrilegiis suis artibus infestus, sciens nullum se posse super his memoriam librum in Arcam profus inferre, in qua erat cum patre suo, &c. Cham (the Son of Noah) who was infested with these superstitions and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in Metal, and hard Stone.

Saint Augustine noteth, that Zoroaster was said to have taught at his birth, when all other children were, which prefigured the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the Inventor of natural Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, saith Pliny and Justine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Heroproses, or Naturalists: or first found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and Minerals, or their Sympathetical, or Antipathetical workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inventor. I rather think that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham, who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew, and acknowledged, the true cause and giver of life and virtue to Nature, and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispriced, and universal power) admired the Instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves (from which the effects were knifable) which belonged to that wisdom, Which being one, and remaining in it self, can do all things, and reneweth all.

Now, whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist

gioni Persice, ut in populo Dei Levite, studisque vere Philosophi, dedit erant: nec quidquam Rex Persarum poterat effigere, nisi ante Magorum disciplinam scientiamque pingeret. The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophy: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Seneca-sis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronus and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his own words are these: Et ne quon mercant premia Polychroni & Theophili, testimonio, sciendum est discipulum esse Magum: alteram ubique ab Origine denatatum, que per fadendum demonibus initia, aut vere, aut apparenter, operatur: alteram ab Origine lauda-tam, que ad praticum naturalis Philosophiæ pertinet, discrete admirabile re operari ex applicatione naturæ naturalium virtutum ad incitem agentium ac patientium. That the Testimonies of Theophilus and Poly-chronus (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood, that Magick is of two sorts, the one evidently where condemned by Origen, which mortally (and there truly or seemingly) by Covenants made with Devils; the other Commended by Origen, which aptaineth to the pratic part of natural Philosophy teaching to work admirable things by the natural application of Natural Virtues, agent and suffering re-ciprocally.

This Partition Hieron doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel, where considring of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of Wise Men formerly remembered, he useth this distinction: Quos nos barbares, ceteri iranici (id est) incantatores, interpretantur, videntur magi esse qui verbis rem præstant, & magi, qui de singulis Philosophantur: Malefici, qui sanguinem antur, & vitium, & sepe contigunt corpora mortuorum and others interpreters incantatores, seem to me such as perform things by words: Magicians, such as handle every thing Philosophically: Witches, that use blood and sacrifice, and often lay hands on the body of the dead:

Further, among the Chaldeans, those who are called by the name of Conjurers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Mathematicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldeans: yea, King and Princes of that Nation do all that they do, according to this Art: whence, at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they first of all understand his birth, & coming unto holy Bethleem, did worship the Child: & Star from above shewing him unto them.
By this therefore it appeareth, that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirm, that Magus bodie dicitur, qui ex fadere factimatur diaboli opera ad rem quancunque. That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Devil, useth his help to any matter: yet as our Saviour said of Divines it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature: other Arts which undergo that Title, were invented by the fallhood, subtilty, and envy of the Devil. In the latter, there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies, for making fides, by an evil Faith: in the former, no other ill, than the investigation of those virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work, to things that suffer. And though by the Jews those exco-municated Magicians, Philosophers, and Divines, were came to worship our Saviour Christ, were tearmed Mages, or Metaphysicians; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Confutetur autem communis Magis pro maleficiis accipit; Common Dante-cion (saith S. Hieron) understandeth Witches, not the name of Magician: unde Ambiguit (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understand good and wise men. Quid igitur operantur Magi non ma-liciosum, non Evangelio gratulor, quod non malicium & veneficum, sed sapientum sunt, & Sacerdotes? O ubi scilicet, sed fidei Fictus? why doubtst thou, that thou to use the name of Magus, a name gratum in the Gospel, which doth not signify a Witch or a Conjuror, but a wise man, and a Priest? For what brought this flander to that Study and profession, but only idle Ignorance, the Parent of countless admiration & Cause fuit misficientia quorundam operum, que (ex vere) sunt naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procurantur demoni-orum, naturæ ipsæ vel conjunguntur, vel communicantur, vel alter ad operandum expedientium fida sunt, opera demonum credentium ad ignorantiam hæc, de operibus huiusmodi & Magis naturæ, quam Necrumantium multi improprè vocant. The marvellousness of some works, which (indeed) are natural, hath been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of devils, & by the natures together, or mingling them, or by the nature of the nature, they were thought to be the works of the devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly, Necromancy.

Mirandula in his Apology goeth further: For by Fol. 80.
understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of natural agents, we are assisted to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) Ignor-antia terminis potentia, & virtutis rerum naturalium, non dubitare illa eadem opera, que fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia. The terms or limits of natural power and virtue not understood, we must needs doubt, whether those very work which Christ did, may not be done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hereticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adju-vari nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I did not heretically, nor superstitiously, but most truly in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought, were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years, fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason answer, That the uttermost of Nature's works being known, the works which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could do, do manifestly testify of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely Supreme and Divine: and thereby those that were faithless, were thereby converted, or put to silence.

SECT.

SECT. III.

That the knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things, under the name and colour of good things.

S E C I N G therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Divinum Cultor, & Interpret: a studium Observer and Expounder of Divine things: and the Art of it self I mean the Art of Natural Magick) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio: than the absolute perfection of natural Philosophy: Certainly then, it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forth with wife and learned men, promiscue, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawful and praiseworthy knowledge with that impious, and to (use Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath thrust, and by them bewitch-ed and begot the graceless men. For, if we condemn natural Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Devil (who knows more than any man) doth also teach Witches and Poisoners the harmful parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Ex-ements: then may we, by the same rule, condemn the Physician, and the Art of Healing. For the Devil also in the Oracles of Amphiarus, Amphidamas, Trochilus, and the like, taught men in Dreams what Herbs and Drugs were proper for such and such Diseases. Now, no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath sought to thrust himself into the same employment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himself for that purpose into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion;
he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrology, by giving a divine power to the Stars, teaching men to esteem them as gods, and not as instruments.
And (as burning observeth) It is true, that Judicial Astrology is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing, takes not away the Art, considering that heavenly bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have, and exercise their operation upon the inferior. For the Sun and the Star of Mars do drie; the Moon doth moisten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have several and proper names, so have they several and proper virtues: the Stars do also differ in beauty, and in magnitude: and to all the Stars hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not: He cometh the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But, into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the Devil seeketh not to thrust in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret virtues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and incantations: and taught men to believe in the strength of Words and Letters (which, without Faith in God, are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the All-powerful Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wife and the simple observe when the Sea birds forsake the shores, and flie into the Land, that commonly some great storm followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken the fair weather: that the crying of Crows, and bating of Ducks, foretold Rain: for they feel the Air moistened in their quills. And it is written in Hieronythe Prophet, Even the Star in the Air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hercupis, this enemy of Man-kind, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen, by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowls, and thereby to judge of good or ill success in the War: and (with-all) to look into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds, and Beasts.
Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heben Princes also: as Abimelech to Ge-
n. 12.
flore Sarah to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by a Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharao, Solomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Job: In Job 33:17.
Dreams and Visions of the night, when sleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cause man to return from his impiety, that he might say, doth the Devil also practise his Divinations by dreams, or (alter Paricifus) divinitati imitatio, & Paricifus.
his mock Divinity. This in the end grew to con-mon Dreams: Misbrutates of those of his Con-vices. Yea, the Romans, finding the inconvenience hereof, because all Dreams (without distinction of cases) were drawn to Divination, forbid the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (ant

Deventury, Chap. 12, seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slain. Yet it is to be condemned, not that Marcus Antonius was the cure of Pompeius the poisoned Wound; nor that which Saint Augustin re-porteth of a Millianus, whose Son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a Dream, where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor that of Athyges of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, for as much as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

SECT. IV.

That Daniel's mistaking Nebuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not ju-stifie all their Practices.

B U T it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathen commonly used, were to be condemned in them, who took on them very to many and strange Revelations: how came it to pass, that Daniel both condemned the hasty fentence of Nebuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldea, and in a sort forbid it? especially considring that such kind of people God himself mandamed to be slain. To this, divers answers may be given.

First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could

could not be known to any man by any Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh; and herein they testified the Power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, It may be conjectured (and that upon good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any of our unlawful Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those men studied and professions were lawful, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction: for himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the Enchanters: of which some were termed Sooth-sayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi, or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbade the execution of that judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawful Arts (though not unlawful according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the King's thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then, in Daniel's dislike, and hindering of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and profession.

SECT. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds; if we not to condemn the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture every where, of good with evil, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: the Good, the Truth, the Purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Devil in the Image of Baal, Astarte, Chemosh, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like, was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrify Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and Religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies; neither can it deter wise and learned men in these days from attributing those virtues, influences, and inclinations to the Stars and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympathetical, and Antipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost virtues, sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Ministers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrify the honest and learned Physicians or Magicians from the using of them to the help and comfort of Man-kind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Devil betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreams, so far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, The prohibition to marking of Fowls

(as signs of good or evil success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against Rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be given. For, if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest Trades and interchange amongst men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge & all learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornful and beggarly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should thrust our selves, Ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaque lucum nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Unthankful towards towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed, not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant: but the Mathematick also, and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned, judge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in Cula. C. omni fidei puerum, elucet: non modiciora similitudine, sed falsitas quam propinquitate. In the Glass of the Mathematick, that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge, not in an obscuring, but in a new and manifest representation.

SECT. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magick.

It is true, that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the Name Magick, and esteemed absolutely to be branches of that Tree, on whose root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy, or Goetic: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the immortal souls of men do not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soul: and therefore the soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute, or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring, or raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These men are so distracted, as they believe, that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless, they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodness, no, not by the fearful Word of the Almighty: and that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom him-delf called the Son of God. So, forgetting these things, proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch, will yet endeavour himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrify with a Phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the bodies, souls, and souls of those which raise them up; as His Majesty in his Book afore-named hath excellently signified, taught: That the Devils obedience is only, secundum dam quid, scilicet ex pado; respectu, that is, upon the bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant Devils, which inhabit Imbecillae imagination: but sure I am, the rail arcaut enough to come uncall'd: and always attending the expectations of their servants and vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or, it may be that these Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardanus mortals Devils, following the Opinion of Rubii de scabulis and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kind of Devils lived not above a Thousand years: which Plutarch in his Treatise of Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For, were it true, that the Devils were in awe of wicked men, or that they were compelled by them, then would they always fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mattered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus, when he had lifted him up in the Air, cast him headlong out of his claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this, perhaps, were done by S. Peter's Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same pranks at other times, upon his own accord, the Devil played with Theodosius, who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortal fall that I had. The like success had Bulus, a principal Pillar of the Manichean Heretic, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth: for a manifest proof hereof, we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Protesius, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: For those that are wretched men (with S. Paul) God shall find them lying in slanders: Of these their supposed transfigurations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the Second Book, and the Fourth Chapter of the Demologia, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are, who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals, of whom Cicero says: Falsi sunt Incantatores, qui in uragae & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauduntur corpore: They are foolish Incantators, which will shut up their Spirits within their nails, or in Glass: for a spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick, a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withals. But the admitting Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so, seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the Professors thereof cover themselves by the ministry of Isis, by sitting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances, and abstract notions, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, are users of evil Faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Others forsake their sort of wicked Divinations; as by Fire, called Pyromantia: by Water, called Hydromantia: by the Air, called Mantechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other, is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practicers whereof are no less envious and cruel, venomous and bloody, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures, having sold their souls to the Devil, work two ways: either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomer's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his car: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomer's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomer perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly, if Bask had lived in elder times, he would have blamed all the Inchanters of the World: for never so much to make him famous among them, could never matter or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Incantments (which the Magians, a people of Italy, practised: Colubros dissumpti Musci castis: undulating Muscia laeti, in maker the Snakes to hunt.) That it hath been used, Stryer, it appears, Psal. 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kind, and even by natural causes it may be done. For, there are many fumes that will either draw them out, or destroy them: as women hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magick or Incantments than to draw out a piece of toiled Cheese.

By divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his Wonders.

But to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other dominion than he hath (not speak of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance: as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he other wise worketh but three ways. The first is, by moving the cogitation and affections of men: The second, by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And, that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason disswadeth them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Teneas eos ligatus Sicut parit (with the same Author) velut inmississimam bellum, de universa St. Angustine was of opinion, that the Frogs which Pharao's Sorcerers produced, were not natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For, as Varius observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Miser were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof, faith Saint Angustine:
Q² Nec

ing to build Towns and Villages, for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briers, Bush-mats, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth; and purposing to follow the Conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

SECT. II.

Of the end of Ninus; and the beginning of Semiramis Reign.

THis he did after the death of her husband Ninus; who, after he had mastered Edris, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea and Philippin (After the 16th excepted) and finished the work of Ninus; he left the world in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 25. years. Plutarch reporteth, that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus, out of Atheniens, and others, speaks of five days. In which time (mov'd either with desire of Rule, or licentious liberty; or with the memory of her husband Ninus, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal call on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her, after his death, the sole Rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylon in Chaldea, to Nineve in Assyria. Justin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her self, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her self to the people in person of her son Ninus, or Zamus, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as the ruled long, so he performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her son Ninus had such a stature at his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the Empire from him 45. years after by any such subtilty (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband) but it may be true, that Ninus, or Zamus (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

SECT. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage and Education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOME Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base Parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis Alesonitis, or Aleson, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philippin. Others report her to be the Daughter of Derecta, a Carrizian of Aleson, exceeding beautiful. Others say, that this Derecta or Derecia, the mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profited a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bank of a Lake adjoining to Aleson; and afterward falling in love with a goodly young man, he was by him made with child, which (for fear of extreme punishment) she conveyed away and caused the same to be hidden among the high Reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the child was left to the mercy of wild Beasts) the time wasted by certain Birds, which used to feed upon or near those Waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fosterage of this child, who being purchased but for a base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of Vows; notwithstanding which, she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought, that from this Derecta, the invention of that Idol of the Philippins (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans face, and a Fishes body; into whose Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the ground; and at the second fall there remained only the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off. For so S. Hieron hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Justin, write it by Dagon only, which signifieth a Fish, and so it only appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self, I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philippins, was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritime (as all those of the Philippins were, and so were the best of Phoenicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

SECT. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after disfigurement: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her Pedigree, I leave it to Assyrian Historians; and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Greeks. For delicacy and ease do more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princess more worthy of Fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon, and elsewhere, and for the Wars she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report, that she never returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army, there survived but only twenty persons; the rest, being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famine, or slain by the Sword of Sambrotes. But, as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbered; so were those that returned, less than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four Millions and upwards.

45. lib. 5.*

wards. For these numbers, which she legied by her Lieutenant Dereceus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three Millions; of Horse-men one Million; of Chariots, armed with hooks on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burthen, two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses, three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads, three thousand, by which the might transport over Indus at once, three hundred thousand soldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phoenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. The incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every Man and Beast fed on grass) are taken from the Authority of Ctesius whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes Expedition into Greece and afterwards; whose Army (though the same was far inferior to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to over-load the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the several Provinces whence those Gallies were taken, hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted, the same being broken, and overthrown by Statrabates, upon the banks of Indus, Canticum cantavit extremum; She sang her last Song: and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the Bird of Venus) whence it came, that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Ensigns.

SECT. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis; and of the Pyramids of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a wall carried four-square of great height and beauty, having on each square, certain brazen Gates curiously engraven. In the Gate of the square, the raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Ras of a less circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all, one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests made the Observation of the Stars; because this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

By beholding the ruins of this Tower, have many Travellers been deceived, who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod) There were burnt in this Temple, one hundred thousand talents of Frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nebuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus re-delivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the full; which Alexander is said to have repaired, by the perswasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramids by Atemphus, which were conspicuous nundique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these Pyramids, Babylonians, a careful observer of Barities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur Archer qui feroit a sa sonnerie, Belles. L. 2.

Et tirant une fleche in l'air a peine pouvoit l'envoyer hors de sa base q' elle ne se tombast sur les degres; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramids, and shooting an arrow from thence into the air, as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

WORLD:

Intreating of the TIMES, from the Birth of Abraham, to the Destruction of Solomon's Temple.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

SECT. I.

Of some of the Successors of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the Question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninus, or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Aneanus be-lows the conquest of Babylonia, and the overthrow of Zameis, contrary to Diadorus, Justin, Orosius, and all other approved Writers.

For Ninus being esteemed no man of War at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now, because there was nothing performed by this Ninus of any moment, other than that out of jealousy he every year changed his Provincial Governors, and built Colleges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arinus his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thucis, but that he reduced again the Babylonians and Cassians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninus his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arinus; but that he added sumptuousity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and some Engines for the War: I will,
for this present, pass them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable (till we meet these Assyrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whose issues, we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ni-nus, Semiramis, Arinus, Aralius, and Xerxes, or Bala-nius. For, otherwise, if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us down without error, by the reigns of the Assyrian Princes; we shall but patch up the Story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion in which to this day it hath remained.
For, where the Scriptures do not help us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis, Historiam non confutare; No marvel

if then in things very ancient, History want assurance. Plataarch
the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's Birth, and in what year the same happened after the Flood. Now, since all agree that the three and fortieth year of Ninus, was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Flood the birth of Abraham happened, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 252 or 293 years; others 352 years between Abraham's Birth and the Flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archelaus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250 years from the Flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the three and forty-eth year of Ninus, according to Eusebius and Saint Augustine, it followeth, by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth was in the year after the Flood 293; or, as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved Question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give Reason for my own Opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk alone, and in a way apart from the multitude:
yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather chuse to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envy casteth at Novelty, than to go on safely and deeply in the safe ways of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

SECT. II.

A Proposal of Reasons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292 after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

Those who seek to prove this account of 292 years, between the general Flood and Abraham's Birth, ground themselves, first, on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70 years, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: Secondly, upon the Opinion of Josephus, Saint Augustine, Beda, Ildor, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are slightly looked over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these Arguments. First, out of the words as they lie; That Terah at 70 years begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham to be counted the eldest Son of Terah, and to necessarily born in the fourteenth year of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the Blessings; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter, was to set down the Genealogie of Christ from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130th year of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132, &c. Moses having no where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130 years: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100 years.

SECT. III.

The Answer to the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Father's death.

To answer all which Objections, it is very easy, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will add somewhat of mine own, according to the small Talent which God hath given me. Now, for as much as the state of the Question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these Arguments, I will make bold with order and method to far as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travels, that serveth as a ground for this Opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the later after his Father's death, the former presently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his Father's death at Haran: a conjecture drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, whereto is written, By Heb. 11. 8. faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place which he should afterwards receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This Supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the Supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran, after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of Saint Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place, so direct and plain, what force hath any Man's fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability or reason to induce it? For, if any man out of this place before alleged can pick any arguments, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan's and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But, that he performed the Commandment of God, after his Father's death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza north, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For, if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself, and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed, we shall find small reason to make us think, that Abraham passed and re-passed those ways, more often than he was enforced to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his Faith in Gods Promises: In which, if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to flee into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise: And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice; all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the ways themselves which Abraham had to pass over; the length whereof was 300 English miles; and through Countreys of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous and barren Deserts of Palmyra, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Herman, or Gilead: and whether there were easy walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300 miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For, if he travelled it twice; then was his journey in all, 1800 miles from Ur to Haran; and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove prove this fancy; the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more proof (that he had not animum revertendi, nor any thought of looking backward) than any man's bare conjecture, be he what what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written

Gen. 11. 7. of him, Then Abraham took Sarah his wife, and Lot his brother's Son, and all their substance that they possit, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now, if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his Wife and Kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or, if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely, that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and preit with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his Father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was more stranger, both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his Father's death: so they, perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage, their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say, that Abraham was in Haran at his Father's death, or some time after, being then by their account, 135 years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four or five years after that time, his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn oath his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely, if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgment, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only Son, who was then five and thirty years old; before which age, most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten children: rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any, in that Country. But, let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat happened, which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abraham's man, in doing his Masters errand, was fain to lay open the whole Story of his Master's prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a Son in her old age, if Abraham himself, a more certain Author, had so lately been among them? would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable; considering how avers he was from permitting his Son to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his own kindred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. Isaac indeed was fitter thence by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own Lineage; and without God's special approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally, was driven to convey himself from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written Examples it may be observed, that God allowed not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered; we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the Posterity of the Hebrews. When Hezekiah was visited with an honourable Embassage from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the Prophets which thereupon he heard by Ezra, made him to know, that the counsel of God was agreeable to such thoughts; which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the Waters of Babylon they late down and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sofar and Neoa, Kings of Egypt, brought calamity upon Israel: and also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt, I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Dentonomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Forces. Whether the Lord had laid any such Injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But, because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can persuade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that St. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they saw any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travels of Abraham are precisely set down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur, or Camerna in Chaldea to Haran, or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Father's death) to Sichem: from Sichem he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt: from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattel were more, then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence, having purified Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gera, in the border of Idumea under Abimelec: and after, near unto it at Borsabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Isaac on the mountain Moria. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran, or Charran, appeareth not in any one Story, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita his Cabala hath feigned, it should in reason therewithall be believed, that he would in those his first travels have provided himself of some certain fear, or place of abiding; and not have come a second time with his Wife, Kinsmen, Family, Goods, and Cattel, not knowing whereto to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, passed through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the plain of Mariab; where, finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel, and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation : from whence again, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South : and always unfettered. By reason of which wandering to and from, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrei.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the Country, we may note, that ere he came into Beit-el and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy feet will I give this Land, shewing it him, as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For, Abraham, without any other provident care for himself, believed in the Word of the living God : neither finding before, nor coming first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second Promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should move any Man to think, that Mosè would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham's, seeing he fetched down all his passages elsewhere, long and short? as when he moved from Sielen, and fared between Hai and Beit-el, the distance being but 20 miles : and when he moved thence to the Valley of Murre, being 24 miles : and when he left Murre, and set down at Gerar, being less than six miles &c. Mosè past over all the times of the first Age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the Story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the Flood in six Chapters : which Age lasted 1650 years : but he belitteth on the Story of Abraham, fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five and twentieth : and this time endured but 175 years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Mosè forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions ; or that he would let down those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have manifested some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's Story.

SECT. IV.

The Answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing, that it was not unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year.

NOW, touching the Objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to have a Son at a hundred : this is hardly worth the answering. Abraham having respect unto Sarah his Wife, when he spake of their many years. For, when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent door at Murre, Loe, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next Verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old, and stricken in age, and it seemed to be with Sarah after the manner of women : therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, when it is said, it seemed to be with Sarah after the manner of Women, it appears that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jochanan, Madan, Isidore, and Simeon : and the eldest of these was born 57 years after Isaac : and the youngest 40 years after. What strangeness then, that Terah, being 130 years old, should beget Abraham, while they say may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at 100 years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145, and Isaac was born in the year 2109, and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was 2145. So if we deduct the number of 2109 out of 2145, there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham began to beget Sons 36 years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137 years old; it is not strange, that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Isaac, Isidore, and Jesse, who lived so many years and Ages after Abraham, began Sons at 100 years, or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah began Abraham at 130, and Abraham others at the same age, and seven years after.

SECT. V.

The Answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's age from the Scriptures, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son, and that there was great cause, why in the Story of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

IT follows now, to speak something to the Objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this Proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's age, unless we make him the eldest Son, is false. For it is plain in the Scripture, that when Terah was 205, which was the year of his death : then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at thage : I answer, That St. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his Father Terah : and Terah died at 205 : soas the 75th year of Abraham was the 205th year of Terah ; which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now, to come to the Objection, where it is said, That Mosè had no respect unto Nabor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ defended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, That Mosè, for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nabor and Haran. For the succession of God's Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nabor and Haran, were they Idolaters, or otherwise. For Nabor was the Father of Beit-el, and Beit-el of Rebekah, the Mother of Isaac : and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milchah : and Sarah was Mother to Isaac, and Grandmother to Jacob : Milchah also, the Wife of Nabor, and Mother of Beit-el, was Jacob's great Grandmother : and the age of Sarah, the Daughter of Haran, is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a Son at 90 years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet, because both Nabor and Abraham married the Daughters of their brother Haran : and because Isaac named Rebekah the grand-child of Nabor ; and Jacob Lea and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nabor : it was not superfluous in Mosè

Mosè to give light of those mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is, Job 24. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural Country and City of Urin Chaldeæ, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldeæ ; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan : and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nabor also, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons Daughters to Isaac, and Sarah, his own kinsmen : he himself having all married in his own Family ; not thinking it pleasing unto God, to mix themselves with Strangers and Idolaters. And that these men were believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For, when Laban had seen the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner, Come in, thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this servant of Abraham's demanded an answer as touching Rebekah, then answered Laban and Beit-el, and said, This thing is proceeded of Jehovah : meaning, that it was the Will of the true God it should be so ; wherein he acknowledged the Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse, it is written, *Take ye, that he may be thy Masters Son's Wife, even as Jehovah hath said*. Their then offering of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a sign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now, although it be the opinion of Chrysostom, and some late Writers, as Cajetan, Oleaster, Masiusius, Calvin, Morer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or Household-gods, which Rachel stole from him : yet, that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nabor, and he called Abraham's servant, blessed of Jehovah, as above said. So as, for my self, I dare not avow that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the Faith.

SECT. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest ; together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

TO the main Objection, which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70 year of Terah's life ; grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scriptures, And Terah lived seventy years, and began Abraham, Nabor, and Haran : To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the fame is no proof at all that he was the eldest and first-born Son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequent, that if he be first named in Scripture was therefore eldest in blood and birth : neither doth it in appear, that if he be first named in Scripture was therefore eldest in nature and time : for Seb was not the first-born of Abraham : nor Isaac of Abraham : nor Jacob of Isaac : nor Judah and Joseph of Jacob : nor David the eldest of Jesse : nor Solomon of David : as it is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah's 500 years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet : shewing, that at the 500 year of his age he began to beget the first of those three Sons. For, according to St. Augustine, speaking generally, Non accedunt ætatem in his ordinatam : sed specificatio tunc dignitatis in qua ordinatam : The order of Nativity is not here to be rejected, but the specification of the future dignity, in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the Sons of Noah, 60 is it here ; where it is said, Thou Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nabor, and Haran : For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his Father Nabor at 29, as other his Ancestors were at 50. The like also happened to Noah's for Kenan Abraham begat Sab at 133, Enoch Kenan at 90, Abraham was begotten at 70, Mahalal Jared at 60, Noah was begotten at 500 years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons, as above said. And Saint Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the Opinion, that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's Sons, than otherwise, though for his excellency he was worthily named first : his own words are these : Fori enim ut patuit politicois generati Abrahamus sed merito excellentis, qui in Scripturis dicitur : commendatus, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, said he, that Abraham was begotten later, but was first named, in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proveth nothing who was first or last born : either in those issues of Noah, or in those of Terah. Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing : for Mosè nameth first the Children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods favour. Prius ego, et post patris electio divina, que comitem sequitur trahit potestatem. &c. De timore, prius pariter dat Sem in libro Noe. &c. Abraham in libro Thare : Prius, fides he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it, or after it, Piety, and the fear of God, gave place and precedence to Sem among the Children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the self, it is manifest, that Abraham entered Canaan in the 75 year of his age. And it was in Gen. 12. 4. Canaan that Hagar bore him Ishmael, when Abraham had lived 86 years. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had confirmed 100 years. It was from the valley of Murre in Canaan that Abraham went out, when he refused Lot, and overthrew Amraphel : and he had then but the age of 83 years : and it is as manifest, that he departed from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But, if Terah begat Abraham at 70 years old, then must Abraham have been 135 years when he first left his foot in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted of Terah's : which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered. For he entered at 75, he refused Lot at 83, he had Ishmael at 86, he had Isaac at 100, proved by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70 year of his age : then had Terah lived till Isaac had been 35 years old, and Ishmael 49 : both which must then have been in Misopotamia, and therein fallen to thage : unless we would either deny credit to St. Stephen, who faith that Abraham departed from Misopotamia after his Fathers death, or else believe the interpretation of Daniel Angelatorum, dum : nor Isaac of Abraham : nor Jacob of Isaac : nor Judah and Joseph of Jacob : nor David the eldest of Jesse : nor Solomon of David : as it is formerly remembered. For it were most improperly spoken, to say, that that those things were done about Terah's death, which were sixty years before. Wherefore, supposing Abraham to have been born in the seventieth year of Terah's; we must give those times and places of birth to Abraham's children, which no Authority will warrant: For Abraham was no Children in Ur of Chaldees, nor in Haran, nor in ten years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's Death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World 2083; and the year of Isaac's Birth was the World's year 2094; which maketh ten years difference. And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the Mountain Moriab therein, thirty nine miles from Beysale, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be, that any of Abraham's Sons were born in Mesopotamia; nor while Terah lived; nor in less than ten years after Terah's Death; and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest Son of Terah, nor born in the seventieth year of Terah's Age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75th Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah lived but 145; for 70 and 75 make 145, which must also have been the full age of Terah; but Terah lived 205 years, and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70th year of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest Brother of Abraham; for Sarah, or Iscrah, wanted but ten years of Abraham's age: Isaac being born when Abraham was a hundred, and Sarah ninety years old.

It followeth then, that, if Abraham had been the elder Brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at nine years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within ten years as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but nine years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iscrah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth both names, faith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Iscrah of Iscrah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For, to speak of anything superfluous, it is not used in God's Book: and if Iscrah had not belonged to the Story, it had been but an idle name, to no purpose remembered.

Now, if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moses had no respect of Nahor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Beheth and Rebekah, the Mother of Isaac, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscrah in this place, were the not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name, of whom there is nothing else said or left?

The age also of Lot disproveth the elderhip of Abraham; for Lot was called an old Man, when Abraham was but 83 years old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah; Abraham marrying one of Haran's Daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within ten years as old as Abraham; it may appear to every reasonable Man (not obtinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham; who also died first, and before his Father left Ur in Chaldees. Also Lysa reasoneth against this opinion of Abraham's elderhip, upon the same place of Genesis; drawing arguments from the age of Sarah, who was but ten years younger than Abraham himself. Lysa his words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso Abraham, sequitur quod non babebat decem annos quando genuit Saran: imò ne etiā, &c. and afterward, & idē melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit ultimus natus de tribus filiis Thare, limen nominatur primus, propter eius dignitatem: & ponendus erat caput stirpis, & generationis sequens: & quia primus factus est ei reponit expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lysa) Haran was younger than Abraham himself, it followeth, that he was not ten years old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the first born of the three Sons of Thare, nevertheless he is named first for his dignity, both because he was to be ordained Head of the Stock and Generation following, and because the Promise of Christ was first made unto him, as before it is said of Sem.

SECT. VII.

A Conclusion of this Dispute, noting the Authors on both sides; with an Admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient Stories the more unprovable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130th year of Terah's Life, and not in the 70th year. For Abraham departing Charan after Terah died, according to St. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed, when he was 75 years old: these two numbers added, make 205 years, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entered Canaan. For my self, I have no other end herein, than to manifest the World's Story. I reverence the judgment of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtful, and could not determine this controversy. For, whatsoever is borrowed out of his sixteenth Book de Civitate Dei, cap. 15, the same may be answered out of himself in his five and twentieth Question upon Genesis. But St. Augustine herein followed Josephus and Isidorus, and Beda followed St. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first born: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus, together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorify the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah; and said, that Abraham was followed with 318 Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; & recitat & adducit in testem habuit, quorum singulis infinita militumda parvas. And that Pharaoh invaded him with a great Army, took from him his Wife Sarah: Such Fables argue that Josephus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292 years from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Ananias for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgment in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in setting down the succession of the Persian Kings under whom they lived, whose History was not so far remote in time, as these Antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet grossly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakes mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed without the confusion treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman Religion are also generally on the same side; it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him; of later times, Beza, Bucer, Calaneo, Favinus, Biez, Brongnius, Dr. Gibbons, and Moore, with divers of the Protestant, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130 year of his father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those nevertheless good Authors, as Bucer, Chisnerus, Favinus, and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sestius Calvisius, proclaiming Bernaldus an arch-heretic in Chronology, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornilius, a Priest of the Congregation of St. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whose Annals are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered; & not alleging Bernaldus, nor any Protestant Writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to Heretics. For my self, I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Roman Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this later account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant Writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgment, that the best approved Historians, divine, and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the Stories, and force-past actions of the World; and not the truth of Histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves, which of these two accounts give the best reputation to the Story of the Scriptures, reaching the World's new plantation, and the continuance of God's Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292 years, or thereabouts, between the Flood and Birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352 years between the one and the other: the one making Abraham to be the first-born of Thare, in the 70th year of his life; the other a younger Son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130 years. And, if we look over all, and do not hastily criticise our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatigued do slothfully and drowsily fit down we shall find it more agreeable, rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some Editions, make it above 1073 years between the Flood and Abraham's Birth: than to take away any part of those 352 years given. For, if we adventurously consider the state and continuance of the World, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we will find, that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pass the times over deeply between Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole Story might perhaps be lost thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, lo was no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withal this Precept of S. Augustine, That whosoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-understood. For, in Abraham's time, all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestine, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India; and those not built with flocks, but of heaven's decree, and defended with walls and rampires; which magnificence needed a Parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to begot doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving aloft strength thereby to common evil-lers, and to those mens apish brains, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters, in the Story of the World and Man-kind.

SECT. VIII.

A Computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore, for the reasons before alleged, I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352 years were consumed; and Abraham, taking the Assyrian History with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43rd year of Nimrod: in which 43 year of Nimrod, Abraham was born: which happened in the year of the World, 2090.

Now, of this time of 352 years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that layged in the East, to wit, 30 years to Chus, ere he begat Saba; of which though the Scriptures are silent, yea, because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first Sons, we may the more fairly give the like allowance to these. For Ebor begat Poly at 34, Poly Regu at 30, Regu Seng at 32. Now, after Saba, Chus begat Hvilah, Saba, Ram, and Sabtes: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth, Gen. 10, which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30 years more to Raama, ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered, that 65 years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born; and that Raama had that age before any of his Sons were begotten, it may be gathered by example and comparison: for Poly the fourth from Noah, as Raama was, begat Rezin the fifth year of his life.

Let us then allow 60, years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel; for few we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65 and 60 make 125. The rest of the time of 131 (in which year they arrived in Shinar, whereof there are six years remaining) we may then for their travels from the East; because they were peopled with women, children and cattle: and, as some ancient Writers have conceived, and because of later times, they kept always the mountain sides, for fear of a second flood. Now, if we take this number of 131 out of 352, there remains 221 of years, which number Berossus bewteth 65 years before, and 43 years before Abraham born: both which S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221, there remaineth 114 years of the 352, from Terah's birth to Abraham's birth; which number of 114 years needeth itself without Nimrod.

And if it be objected, that this time given to Nimrod is overlong; sure, if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather rather appear over short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but 179 years, whereof he reigned 112; whereas Sale, who was the Son of Arphaxad, the Son of Sem, lived 403 years: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the Son of Chus, the Son of Cham.

Now, after Abraham was born, Nimrod reigned 9 years, which added to 43 make 52. Nimrod died, and leaveth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylon and Assyria 42 years, and died in the 52 year complete of Abraham's life.

Ninus, or Zameis, succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38 years; in the second year of whose reign Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85 years old, he refused his nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel, King of Shinar, or Babilonia. Ninus reigned 38 years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 22 years after Semiramis died: which was the 75 year of his age; so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninus, the son of Ninus and Semiramis, whose 23 years, as aforesaid, being the 75 year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85 year of Abraham, and the 33 year of his own reign: after which he reigned five years, which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninus, are not easily answered. Howbeit, for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set down, according to the times noted by Moser in the Story of Abraham, it is most certain; unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moser's computation, which were impiety, or account the whole History of Ninus and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemn all ancient Historians for Fables.

SECT. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninus the Son of Ninus.

And now, touching this Amraphel, whom Moser makes King of Shinar, or Babilonia, in the 85 year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33 year of the reign of Ninus Zameis the King of the Assyrians, the Son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babilonia, Ninus Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it self as most probable is, that which hath been already noted, that this Ninus, or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who, invaded Traconitis, or Bisan, and overthrew those five Kings of Pontus, or the Valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babilonia; and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85 year of Abraham's life, wherein he reigned Lot, the Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch; for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moser in the first Verse of the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pontopolis, or the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel; as it is written, These were the Kings which Chedorlaomer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him; and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia. Now Persia being seated over Tygris, and to the East of Amraphel's Country; and the other two Kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar, or Babilonia: Amraphel, who held Babilonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great force or large Dominion. For, had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis, whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three or four Kings for this Expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings (as it is manifest that he was: For these little Kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet it makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be that the great and potent Empire of Assyria had now (as we shall find) a down-right fall at the time of this War: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phœnician Sea; to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

SECT. X.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings, and that Elias, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlosyria and Arabia Petraea.

Now the two other Kings joined with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Ellasar, the other the Nations. For Ellasar, Aquila and Hieron write Pontus; so Josephus thinketh that it should be Hellespont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is only to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, is in Hellespont far distant, and out of the way to find any Armies into Arabia Petraea, or into Idumæa; which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certain that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the less. For at such times as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as Commanders; but used all the Art they had to invite Cæsar to their assistance; persuading him, that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise, what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made War with Bera, King of Sodom, Birsha King of Gomorrah, Shinab King of Admah, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela, which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex; being such a kind of Reguli, as Josephus found in the Land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoining; of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Josias. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power; and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus, or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotence and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleged for an Example, that divers Kings far off came to assist Pompey against Cæsar; yet these same examples, without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty

SECT. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

The fourth King by Abraham overthrown, was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gogim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyx of mixt People; Calcia of Rummages without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilee was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt People: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam talia sunt qui Galilee inhabitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, faith Strabo; and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And so it may be; but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this Question. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For, when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not but there are many petty Kingdoms adjoining to Phœnicia, and Palœstina, as Galymæa, Betanea, Ladicea, Apamea, Chalcidea, Cappadia, Calathonia, and all these do also join themselves to Mesopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probable conjecture.

SECT. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia; and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

Lastly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrap, Viceroy, or Provincial Governour of Babilonia, and that the other Kings named, were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moser was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyria King of Elam: those Kings named in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldeæ, Shinar, Babilonia, or Assyria; but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer, or Chedorlaomer was so called of Kider, from Cidarius, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale; for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persians wore on their heads.

Neither do I believe, that the Assyrian or Babilonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so forth a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it felt had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself: all whose chief Commanders became Kings after him. Timberlan conquered Asia and India, with a storm-like, and terrible success; but to prevalent fury, God hath adjoined a short life; and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in haste, he taketh the least care for their continuance. The fruit of his Victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus, being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour-petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar's and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes no less doubtful than fearful: But the whole Country by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; a narrow Valley of ground, lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Sair; inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanon on the North; consisting of two small Provinces of Tracœnia, or Bisan, and the Region of the Machabees; a conquest far unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia theless. But as the Vulgar, and Aquila, convert Ellasar by Pontus; so Symmeon makes Arioch, a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as far fetched to join with the Assyrians in this War, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellasar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the Mountains whereof the Ark did rest; so do they in this place retain the word Ellasar, being doubtful to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himself remembereth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latine translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellar in the border of Calosyria; and St. Hieron calleth Ellar the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now, although the same be seated by Stephanus in Calosyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King; who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his Conquests, because of the same Family, and defended from Cham and Chus; after whom the name of Arin was by the Hebrew written Arioch; and afterward again Arabis: as in the Machabees; the Kings of Arabis holding that name even to the time of St. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas, commanding in Damascus. They were Princes, for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel; that in the time of Nebuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings; which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the Son of that Arioch, Confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus, nor of Syria, Regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babilonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nebuchodonosor, is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans; who are a Nation of Peftars, bordering on Assyria, according to Stephanus, though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast and Media; and if any Brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that House (known by the name of Arin, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the Government of that Persian Province, called Elymas (as it seemeth they had, by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nebuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of, may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabis, the Son of Arin, the Confederate of Ninus, which the Sons held league as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West into Babilonia, and Chaldeæ; and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own blood and blood; which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

Dei. Sic. lib. 2. c. 1.

bout-Princes, and became victorious over them: a Man violent, insolent and cruel. Siniramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious than her Paramour's enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein, with buildings unexampled. But her Son, having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no less feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a succour. For, In Reges Babylonico hic pariter resonant: This King ruled little (saith Nauclous of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is, that the racks of mortal Men, having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and dejected condition of living in slavery: no long descent having as yet invited the Affryan with a right; nor any other risk, being for him pretended, than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate Son of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his Vassals, with a powerless trafficking, and a Mind less industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reign forty two years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to Man's estate, winced to the World, that he so much preferred Ease before Honour and bodily Pleasures before Greatness: as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentions peril enjoy.

These confulations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Mofes, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferior to the King of Persia, than either his superior, or equal; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Siniramis was at that time broken asunder, and re-joined again to Babylonia.

For conclusion, I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to inspire that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Chorran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700 miles, or little less, with Women, Children, and carriages; the Countries through which he wandered were then settled, and in peace. For it was the twenty third year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of twenty three years after the death of Siniramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Siniramis's Army of four Millions, with her self, utterly confined in India, and all her Armies and Engins of War at the time time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest Souls and weakest hearted of the World, to repurchase their former liberty.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arins the Son of Ninias or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians, and Caspians, and again subverted them: which needed not, if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninias's Death. And as Arins recovered one part, so did Baleus, or Belaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom it is said, that he conquered from Egypt to India; and therefore was called Xerxes, Victor or Triumphator, A Conqueror and Triumphator, which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madness, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection.

Now, if we shall make any doubt thereof, that is, of the conquest of Arins and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the rest of Ninus and Siniramis to be but feigned; but if we grant this conquest, then it is true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Affryan Empire was torn asunder, according to that which had been gathered out of Mofes, as before remembered.

SECT. XIII.

That it is not improbable that the four Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves; and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if so, we need not say, that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all Writers, whose works have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows, were Lords of those Regions, wherunto they are, or seem intitled; doth almost enforce us to think, that the History must so be understood, as I have delivered. But, if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for People of those Lands; or if (as Hierom hath it) Chedorlaomer was King of the Elamites, as Tidit was said to be of the Nations, that is, of People, either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions; then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties, which Men, perhaps, have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For, as it had been a strange conjecture to think that Arins was drawn to assist the Persian against the Solimitic, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation, it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should pass through to great a part of the World, as the Countries of Affrya, Chaldea, Misopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his Ear, being disjoyned by so many great Nations of different Languages, a wise Man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea, the Kingdom of Elasar and that of Tidit, so far off removed, were become his dependents; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrah? and when he should have fought the establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyrus and Sidon, and the great City Damascus, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now, as these doubts, which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea, and more, as being grounded upon the Text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that that small Province, or rebel against so powerful a Monarch? Or if it were so, that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them; was it not more than madness in them, when his terrible Army approached, still to entertain hope of evasion; yea, to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute, and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea, between themselves and the River Indus? Likewise, on the part of Chedorlaomer, we should find no great wisdom, if he, knowing the weakness of this People, had raised such a World of Men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to countervail one Month's charges of so huge an Army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the waiting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few Prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their Army in the Field? Now, the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed so great) make any fearful matter; but compose the two Armies as equally match, saying, they were four Kings against five; yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings: of which great slaughter no History makes mention: Neither will the reign of Ninias, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died so soon; neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these four Kings were not the same that they are commonly thought; nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these Kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same Title; Lords and Commanders every one of his own Company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troop of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Thucydides, with the manner of Discoveries, Conquests and Plantations in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many Kings as several Armies; or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies; may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual for the Leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted; nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the slothful quality of Ninias then reigning in Affrica; whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking Spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed in the Reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilst others, more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the content of the whole stream of Writers upon this place, make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, Amraphel was Ninias; and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloth decayed, he might well be inferior to the Postum Chedorlaomer; or if this do not satisfy, we may say that Amraphel was an under-King, or Satrapa of Shinar, under Ninias; who may be supposed to have had his Imperial Seat in his Father's City, Ninive; and to have preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the City of his Mother, whom he hated as a usurper of his right. But, if it were possible that in a case not concerning any Man's Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might err; then can I think that the opinion, that those four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant, both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add, that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Postum King, than King of Postu: And that Arioch (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a Man of Action, or being a worthy Man's Son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these Captains or petty Kings. These, and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost belov'd upon it; especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Reader's pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seem better than these. But of what countries or people forever these four were Kings, this Expedition is the only publick action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to this Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews, Elsau and Jacob, as they are regulated by Mosés, because it is not our purpose, either to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we pass them here in silence. And because in the Story of Abraham and his Posterity, there is much mention of Egypt, by which it appears, that even in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing Kingdom; it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the Antiquities and first Kings thereof.

Of the Kings of Egypt, from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

SECT. I.

A Brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt; with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Soon after the confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham, with many of his issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and took possession of the Country ; in which they built many Cities ; and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The antient Governours of this Kingdom, till such time as Israhel departed Egypt, are shewn in the Table following.

The Table, and especially the Chronology, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obcurity manifest and manifest truth cannot be found. For S. Auguftine, a man of exceeding great judgment, and incomparable diligence, who had fought into all Antiquities, and had read the Books of Parr, which now are loft, yet omitted the fucceffion of the Egyptian Kings, which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonian, whom he remembereth, than whom doubtles they were more glorious. One great occafion of this obcurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests; who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many fearings, and recounted unto frangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for thefe reports of fuppofed Kings, it fhall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent Works, and royal Buildings in Egypt, fuch as are never found but in States that have greatly flourifhed, witnefs that their Princes were of marvelous greatnefs, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether falfe. A fecond caufe of our ignorance in the Egyptian Story, was the too much credulity of fome good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of fundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own names what they as pleafed them belt, have confounded them, and as it were enforced them upon us by their Authority. A third and general caufe of more than Egyptian darknefs in all ancient Hiftories, is the Edition of many Authors, by John Annins, of whom (if to the confufion of fundry very Learned I may add mine) I think thus: that Annius having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved Writs confirm him; but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass, that the account of Authors, either in the Chronology or Genealogy of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian Writers, such as are antient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Annius: his Authors: The profane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

SECT. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the Flood.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the antient Kings about whom is most controverted, the best mean is by help of the Dynasties of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Affairs, Trjans, Italy, Babylonia, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16th Dynasty is joined by general consent with the 43 year of Nimrod, in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, so that all the twelve which were call'd the greater gods, so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The 13th Dynasty endured 14 years; the fourteenth 26, the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to have been continued by the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161 years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dynasties, was such as hath been mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this only reason, that Annius hath it so; considering, that both hitherto, it hath pass'd as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid, the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161 years, which, according to our account, were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352 years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Chus's reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear: For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of man-kind

SECT. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

The first continuance of the Dynasties doth shew that they were not several races of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to fill themselves with. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted. For in refutations of decayed Antiquities, it is more easy to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of some truly Counsellor, onely relieving the Sovereignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to do. The Ministers of the Palace, and as the Turks doth to the Chief Eunuchs, were the Chams, and so doth to the number of the Dynasties. Many are under the name of Cham, and more than one under Osiris, Amphote, and must therefore have been successors, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such Princes borders to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Amphote the Phylip, in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about concension, did nothing without Phicol, Captain of his Host. Though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriages, he followed his own pleasure. Likewile of Abimelech, the King of Gidon, it was said: It is not he the Son of Jerubbaal 12 Isaiah his Officer. Alfo Jibethah, the Son of Saul, feared even the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself, hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of His the Edomite, living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: there- fore likely, both by his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of the Government upon others; and upon jealousy, the companion of un- worthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all, the proofs the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph: Only in the King's Throne will I be above thee 13 Isaiah I have fite thee over all the Land of Egypt. William de Trobrioh of Tyre, will, Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord, one thousand and one hundred eighty, affirms that, like, or ens. 19. a very fame form of Government by Viceroy, as in his time practised in Egypt, having there been a Pharaoh (as he believed) ever since the time of Flois. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Country, however they have been so deemed; but that they acknowledge'd and humbly performed the duty of subjects unto the Caliph: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of Civil Government, but the power of making War and Peace, with the whole Office and Authority Royal, to the Soldans hands. He that shall read 14 Isaiah of Tyre, the flatness of the Caliph, or Mulien Edwahed, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling like a Viceroy. Lib. 19. c. 22.

To think that many names of inferior Regents, or Lieutenants, as Joseph was, have crept into the Lift of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him The man that is Lord of the Land, and The Lord of the Country; besides, it is not unlikely, that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to poltrotry, as ignorant men and strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilst that the King himself, intending his quiet, had given his Office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus; each of whom, citing their relations, as good Authority, after Menas, and Sesibius was the nineteenth King after Menas; whereas, that he was the 332 after Menas; which could not have been, if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, that the Dynasties were not so many Races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Linages or dynasties of men. Now, by whatsoever means a Dynasty is raised, Herodotus continued; whether in one Family, as being made an hereditary Office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is, that was the King's gift and free choice, that gave the Office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election; which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's children hereby, either have been intralled amongst the rest of the people, or the next successor : or enjoying their father's Land, though not his Estate, have been more mighty than the King : as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the King himself their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God thence the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esay, it is said of Pharaoh, I am the Son of the ancient King.

Esa. 19.

SECT. IV.

Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Ofiris.

THAT the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chenezer, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the Posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances.

For I think it is no where found, that the Countries of Chloph, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Ofiris called himself the eldest Son of Cham, saying, Mili pater Saturnus duxit omnium junior : alio, Sim Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso herens ; which must needs be understood of Cham ; for this Saturnus was Cham : as it is said, that on the Monument of Ninus was an Inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Egyptius.

Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not far from Egypt, doth testify, that Ham reigned in those parts: And S. Hieron. in questuibus Hebraicis, faith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his days, call their Country Ham ; as in four several places in the Psalms this Country is called the Land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plinius in Ofiris, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Country of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chemia, ut puto (faith he) a Chamo Noe filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidoro, Aegyptumque hodie Aegyptum lingua Kam vocant ; that Egypt unto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the same reasons may suffice to be alleged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15 first Dynasties : Neither is it strange, that the reign of Cham should last so long as 161 years ; considering that Son lived 600, Arphaxad and Seth above 400. But strange it had been, if one Salus created by Momus, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 12 years, and with Beon, Apocan, Apocis and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Ofiris, Orus and Sesoftris. Reinecius in Hist. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Ofiris, according to Diodorus ; who, faith he, was the Son of Hammon : Krentzenius faith, that Mizraim and Ofiris, are words of near affinity and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the Son of Cham, was Lord of Egypt ; and Reinecius, citing good authority in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their own language, Maze. Neither do I see cause of doubt whether Ofiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to these manifestly, how long Mizraim, or Ofiris reigned : For whereas the year of his death is no where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Ammius his Borsius, to have begun his reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynasty of the Tubekai began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius, who avoucheth as much ; next, by Diodorus, who faith, that he inhabited Thebes ; which habitation of Ofiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well believe ; assenting so far to Reinecius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only according to the several seats of the Kings.

SECT. V.

Of the time when Ofiris reign ended, and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the Son of Ofiris.

THE death of Ofiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The only conjecture that I know is made thus : Lebaim the Son of Mizraim, called Hercules Lybius, made war in Italy, to revenge his father's death on the associates of Typhon, in the 41 year of Baluts King of Affrica ; before which year he had made many great Wars in Egypt, Phoenicia, Tygris, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia and Spain ; and having ended his Egyptian Wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus far Borsius, or Authors following Borsius. That Orus, last of all the gods (as they were styled) held the Kingdom of Isir, Diadema Sicutus finally faith ; and Plutarchus as much, to which all Historians agree. Krentzenius hereupon saith, that six years may be allowed to the Wars, which Hercules was made in so many Countries, after the Egyptian Wars were ended : so should the death of Ofiris have been the 34 of Baluts, when himself had reigned 297 years. I think that Krentzenius was a greater Scholar than Souldier. For surely, in those days, when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a far longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time, though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent ; which was (doubtless) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Ofiris had been the 34 of Baluts, then must Israel have come into Egypt but 7 years before the death of Ofiris ; and have lived there in the reign of Typhon : A thing not easily believed. For it was the same King who advanced Josaph, had him fend for his father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his father's Funeral ; as may easily be gathered out of the Book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reign of Ofiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the 7 year of Israel's coming into Egypt, we must needs cut off 23 years from that number, which Krentzenius conjectures his reign to have continued ; namely, seven which he should have lived after Jacob's coming into Egypt ; nine, in which Josaph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming ; and other seven, in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Ofiris, yet before Josaph's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his Wars. For the War which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have endured ten years : After which proportion, we may well give not only six years, as Krentzenius doth, but 23 more to so many Wars, in so many, and so far distant Countries, as are named before ; yea, by this proportion, we may attribute unto Orus the 12 years, which passed between the time of Josaph's being fold into Egypt, unto his advancement, considering that Pauphar, who bought him, and whose daughter he may seem to have married, continued all that while chief Steward unto Pharab ; a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilst in Egypt, as the tyrannous usurpation of Typhon must needs have brought brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Pauphar, for his faithfulness to Orus the Son of Ofiris, was by him in the beginning of his reign, made his chief Steward, at which time, buying Josaph, and finding him a just Man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate unto Josaph's hands, than unto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps, I might proceed further, and say, That when the buying of Josaph pleased Pharab, and all his servants ; then Pauphar, Priest of On, being chief Officer to Pharab, did acknowledge in Josaph, the ancient graces of God, and his injurious imprisonment : whereupon he gave him his Daughter to Wife ; and being old, resigned his Office of chief Steward unto him, who afterwards, in regard of Pauphar, did favour the Priests, when he bought the Lands of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike the Fable book of Aesop, Pauphar's Daughter : but, unto such as consider God works usually by means ; and that Pauphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died, it would seem a matter more probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the Wars of Hercules, in which, by this reckoning, he should have spent forty two years after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian Wars considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us ; but for us ; or, if it were against us yet could it not weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the indisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless, I freely grant, that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

SECT. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Egyptus, Orus, and the two Scollotes, successively reigning after Mizraim ; and of divers Errors about the former Scollotes.

CONCERNING the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angulo saith, he giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proof, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable ; alleging no witness, but as it were, saying, Tell me this ; yet herein we may think him to speak probably, for as much as the learned Krentzenius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his fathers revenge ; and was not long in performing it ; and that leaving Egypt to his Brother, he followed ether Wars in the same quarrel, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzenius doth) out of Borsius, that Hercules reigned after Typhon's year, seeing Avontius, a follower of Borsius, hath it so, I will also believe it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, seven years were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzenius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus's seven years after the death of Ofiris ; forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable, I think he wanted not. Now, whereas he alloweth ninety years of the eighteen Dynasties to Ofiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus ; it seems that the reign of Orus lasted a hundred and fifteen years. From the death of Orus, to the departure of Isir out of Egypt, there passed a hundred twenty two years by our account ; who (according to Brasard and others) think that Abraham was born in the hundred and thirtieth year of Torab, and thereupon reckon thus : From the end of the Flood to the Birth of Abraham 352

From that Invocation of Abraham 75
Time to the Departure out of Egypt 430

which Sum divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there do remain (as is aforesaid) only a hundred twenty two years from the death of Orus ; we are now to consider, how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesoftris, or Sesoftris's, who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiasts Apollonius ; not without good probability. For this great King or Conqueror, is by many Histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Asia ; to have built a Fleet of Ships on the Red-Sea, and so to have entered into India ; like wife with another Fleet on the middle-Earth Seas to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reinecius judgeth) whom Julius, crying in account of his time, callth Vexoris ; For Julius placeth Vexoris in Ages before Ninus's ; whereby it would follow that Sesoftris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Ofiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Isir out of Egypt, no one Pharab came into the Land of Canaan (which liech in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father-in-law of Salamon, Pharab Vaphres, took Gera, and gave it to his Daughter (as we may read more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time, Sesoftris (said Robinson, and Necho sought passage through the Land of Israhel, when he made his Expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres, and Necho, it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesoftris. Of Sesoftris, it is doubted by some, for as much as he came into Judea with a great Army, Reinecius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided ; unless it be sufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himself placeth Sesoftris next to Orus, following the Scholiasts Apollonius. But further answer may be made, to them that they were not one. For as Julius witnesseth, Sesoftris, otherwise Vexoris, made War on people far removed, abiding from his neighbours. Sesoftris came purposely against Hierusalem, Sesoftris, as Diadema witnesseth, had but 24000 Horse, Sesoftris had 60000. Sesoftris had 8020 Chariots, Sesoftris 1200. Sesoftris made his Expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name Sesoftris, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Jerusalem, and give him countenance in his new reign which he had avoured even against Salamon ; therefore Sesoftris must needs have reigned whilst Israhel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzenius collecteth out of Hercules, and Diadema, that one Momus, or Mosis, was next to Orus ; because those Historians affirm that he reigned next after the Gods ; it moveth me nothing. For Ofiris did succeed those fifteen Gods ; namely, the twelve great, and three lesser himself also (as the learned Reinecius noteth) being called Momus. Which name, as also Momene, and Momus, were titles of Dignity ; though mistaken by some, as proper names, Krentzenius doth very probably gather, that Momus was Momene Tetramomene, the Hebrew word Momus signifying an Arithmetician ; in which name Tetramomene might might well be attributed to Ofis, who was a great Conqueror, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great undertakings, Seffis was no whit inferior to Ofis. For he fought Victory not for Gain, but Honour only; and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royal disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great Treason, the House in which he was, being by his own Brother purposely Fired; which nevertheless, he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty years: after which time, he chose rather to die than to live, because he fell blind. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Seffis lived a Son, whose name was Phoron, or Phoronis, who afterwards took the name of Seffis, but was nothing like to his Father in Glory; for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness, Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nile with a Javelin which tale Diodorus having like with heard, yet reports as a fable, saying, that perhaps he took the difficulty naturally from his Father. How long this Man reigned, it is nowhere expressed; yet, forasmuch as Orus the second (otherwise Bafis) who succeeded him, began fourteen years after this Seffis had been King, it must needs be that this reigned fourteen years at least. That Bafis began not until these fourteen years at least were expired, the very account of time from the first Bafis to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been seventy five years. That none came between Seffis the second, and Bafis, or Orus the second, it stands only upon probabilities, which are these: After Seffis had reigned some while he fell blind; after certain years, he recovered his sight, as is said, which may have been true, but is more like to have been a Fable: surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set down, is very fabulous; namely, that by looking upon a Woman, or washing his Eyes with her Water, who had only known her own Husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his reign before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of fourteen years; so his works, which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus and Diodorus; a part of which may seem to have been the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the Chancels and Sluces of Nilus whom, I think, he rather frighted (as his Father had done) with Spades and Shovels, than with Darts and Javelins; and by his diligent oversight of that work, was like enough to lose both his Eye-sight and his People's love; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

SECT. VII.

Of Bafis, the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his Successor Queen Thermutis, that took up Moses out of the Water.

AND herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Bafis, who was afterwards King, is like to have had a son, as Tenochus did with the Son of Solomon. For that Bafis himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the Children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Seffis, as Tenochus was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the King by industry; and afterwards with the People, by inciting them against their new King, as Tenochus did. For what the multitude will endure at one Prince hands, they will not at another's; unless he have either an equal Spirit, or a fairer Foundation. However over he fought to derive all the pain and labour of public works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did so to his own People which was very plausible; who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now, that Orus the second, or Bafis, was the King that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of downing the Hebrew Children, which (saith Cicero) lasted ten Months: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers: who also think that herupon grew the Fable of Bafis sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exodus 1, that the King who knew not Joseph, was a King of a new Family. That Bafis was of a new Family, Herodotus doth shew; who also thinks him an Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Bafis, according to all Mens computation, began his reign five years after the Birth of Moses; before whose Birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more, that the persecution began; which Banning thinks to have lasted eighty seven years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Seffis the second, how great the power of the Regent, or Viceroy in Egypt was; and how great confidence the King did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for Bread; giving at the same time the belt of the Land to his own Father and Brethren for nothing; seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for Bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go Joseph, who he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetcht out of Prison, a King well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and sovereign Authority: it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a Man of special Reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked Men also, as his instruments against the day of Wrath. Therefore, perhaps, the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his reign was not accounted to have begun till the Death of Seffis. But whether Bafis did usurp the Kingdom, or protection of the Land by violence; or whether the blind King resigned it, keeping the Title; or whether Bafis were only Regent whilst the King lived, and afterwards (as it is acknowledged by all) King himself: it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and thereby after, King in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind King Seffis the second oppressed Israel: But, for as much as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant showed his evil nature, even when he first rose: I think it more likely, that Bafis did it, using at first the Power of a King, and shortly after the Title. Thus of the 122 years which passed between the beginning of Seffis his Reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, forty seven being spent, the seventy five which remain, are to be accounted to Bafis, or Orus the second, and his Children. Bafis himself reigned thirty years, according to Enchiridion; whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his Daughter, who took Moses out of the Water, is said, by all that I have read, to have reigned twelve years. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Mathis, according to Cicero: Enchiridion calls her Aceris; and out of Arrianus his History, Meris: Joseph calls her both Aceris, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panoplia, saith, that she was honoured afterwards of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermis the Daughter of Amnefis, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken; for the Scriptures call her not Pharaoh's Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amnefis indeed is set next before Bafis, or Orus the second, by Enchiridion and others; but whether he were King, or only a Regent, I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians, name the Son of Seffis, Phoron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amnefis; and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Niece or Grand-child, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the Glory of Seffis, and the disreputation of his Son. If so, and that Bafis, or Orus the second, marrying her, pretit it to himself, by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was the both Daughter, Grand-child, and Wife unto Pharaoh; and surviving him, Queen of the Land twelve years. But if she was Daughter of Orus the second, and Sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her Brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule when her Father died.

Daughter,

SECT. VIII.

Of the two Brethren of Queen Thermutis; and what King it was, under whom Moses was born; and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

HE had two Brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telgonis, who is only named by Enchiridion; but his lineage and off-spring delcared by Reinacius. Rathoris, after his Sifters Death, reigned nine years; after whom Cheneris, thought to be his Son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Cheneris, Enchiridion saith, that Telgonis begat Epaphrus upon Is, of which History elsewhere he reporteth upon Is. After the death of Cheneris (whom some call Aceris, but all, or most do file Sakus), a night against God) Athoris reigned eight years; and then Cheneris fifteen. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the eleventh year of Cheneris, it is said by Enchiridion, that Epaphrus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely; viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea: else could it not have had thus reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity, seems to have taken all from Cheneris, the Grand-child of Cheneris. For whereas Amnis is said to have reigned four years after Cheneris; and Amnis one after Amnis; these two Kings are by Enchiridion and others, accounted as one, and his Reign said to have been five years. His name is called Amnis, otherwise Danais; and his Pedigree thus described by Reinacius in Historia Julia.

Telgonis:
Epaphrus:
Lybia, who had Agenor, Belat, and Basiris.

Epaphrus or Ramephis, who gave name to the Country, having expelled his Brother Danais, reigned, and begat Lycanor, married to Hypermetra.

How it might come to pass, that the Nephews Sons of Epaphrus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cheneris, it is hard to say; considering that Epaphrus himself is reported by Enchiridion, to have been born in the time of Cheneris. But for as much as the History of Epaphrus his Birth, is diversely related by Enchiridion, it may suffice, that Isidor the Father of Danais and Epaphrus, otherwise called Amnis and Ramephis, was equally distant from Bafis, or Orus the second, with Cheneris the Grand-child of Cheneris. And that the Posterity of Telgonis did many very young, it appears by the History of these two Brethren, Danais and Epaphrus; of whom the former had fifty Daughters, the latter fifty Sons; perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers Women: yet surely they began to beget Children in their first Youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Amnis, or Danais, did succeed Cheneris; and (according to Enchiridion, and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Ramephis followed, who reigned 68 years. This Ramephis, or Epaphrus, is that Amnefis, Amnefis, or Amnefis, under whom, in the opinion of Enchiridion, and of Banning that follows Mosaicus, Moses was born; and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew Children. The length of his reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mosaicus's opinion. For, whereas as the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mosaicus herupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he flew the Egyptian at the fortieth year of his age; and fled into the Wilderness, and there abode for fear: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Ramephis who reigned so long, wherefore, dubious rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Error, he placeth one Amnefis (whose name is found in the List of Egyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an Age 112 or 113 years, more ancient than others left him in; and to continuing the Catalogue of his Successors from Thomosis (whom Enchiridion calls Anafis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each Man's reign than is the difference between Mnefis and Enchiridion; he finds Moses born under Amnefis, and Israel delivered in the days of his Son Amnefis. The very name of Amnefis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharaoh, of which name one was thought to have flourished, either as a King, or as a wife Man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Amnefis to Pharaoh, Pharaoh, Pharaoh, or Pharaoh, the change is not great. Mosaicus was a Man of excellent Learning and Industry; and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable Works: yet my assent herein is withheld from him by these Reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Cheneris was King, who was drowned in the Red Sea.

Sea. Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. All are dead, &c. may better be understood of Israhel, and all his children, than of one King alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apostate, faith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120 years old, which was this Armenianum, being then King of Egypt. After Ramefles, Amosis reigned 19 years; who is thought by Morator, and perceptibly by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea; of which our Opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to order the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

CHAP. III.

Of the Delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

SECT. I.

Of the time of Moses Birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt

TRue it is, that the History it self is generally well known; yet concerning the time of Moses his Birth, who was the excellent and famous Instrument of this, and other great Works of the Highself, the different opinions are very near as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives, in his Annotations upon S. Augustine, cites very many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrio out of Sanchoniat, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis; But, if he did mean the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit; for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories, divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived, the commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely; neither were the Ammonites, or Mabites, or Edomites, while he ruled, in verum natura.

A second Opinion he remembereth out of Apoth, taken from Pholomy, a Priest of Mender, who faith, that Moses was born while Isachard did rule the Argives, and Amose in Egypt.

The third Opinion is taken out of Pistemon, in his Greek History, the first Book; that Moses was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatiani Affrica, who, though he cite some Authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan War, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Nannius the Philosopher, who took Moses and Mose to be one; confirming the same out of Atapannus, who consisteth that Mose was called Museus by the Grecians; and who farther delivereth, that he was adopted by Cheneph, or Thermatis, the Daughter of Egypt; the same which Eupolamus calleth Moris; others (as Rabanus Maurus or Thomaster, Eufebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolamus, in his first Book, de Bonis, Moses, vir Dei conjunctissimus, is called Museus Judaeorum. Eufebius, in his Chronologie, finds that Mose was born while Amosis ruled Egypt. The ancient Mention calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Mose birth, Thomasis, or Thomsi: the same, perchance, which Apoth the Grammaticus will have to be Amose, and elsewhere Amosis, the father of Sablos: to whom Lydus, Isidore, and Cornelius Tacitus, gave the name of Nicobris. To me it seems most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Sphorus, or Sphorus, governed Affrica; Ortopolis, Seyonia, and Crisius the Argives; that then (as Seffir the second, ruling in Egypt) Mose was born. For, if we believe S. Augustine, it was about the end of Ceop's time, that Amose led Israel out of Egypt. Edm Mose ex Ar- gypto populum Dei novissimum tempore Ceopis Armenifum Regis; Mose (faith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Ceop's time. Now, Saphrus ruled twenty years; his successor Mamulus thirty years; Spartus after him forty years; in whose fourth year Ceop began to govern in Affrica; Affrader followed Spartus, and held the Empire one, and forty years. Soas Mose being born while Saphrus ruled Affrica; Ortopolis Seyonia, and Crisius Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, faith S. Augustine, as Ceop did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Mose was in the nineteenth year of the Affrican Saphrus; for take one year remaining of twenty (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamulus, and the forty years of Spartus, these make seventy one, with which there were waited three years of Ceop's fifty years: then take nine years out of the reign of Affrader, who was Spartus successor, those nine years added to seventy one, make eighty, at which age Mose left Egypt; and add these nine years to the three years of Ceop formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Ceop's fifty, and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming, that towards the end of Ceop's time, Mose led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now, the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine years before the birth of Mose, and fifty four years, or rather more, after Josaph between whose death, and the birth of Mose, there were consumed sixty four years, some of which time, and eighty years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For, as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burdens; and they built the Cities, Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty, they caused the children of Israel to serve, and made them weary of their lives, by fire labour in Carters and Brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power, and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed; even from fifty four years, or not much more, after the death of Josaph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370 to the eightieth year of Mose, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514 towards the end thereof, as

cording to Adamus, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Mose, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal place therein named in this Discourse.

SECT. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scriptures.

THis City, which the Hebrews call Zaan, was built seven years after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes, and so doth Jeremy; the Septuagint, Tartim; Tosaph, Protadus, alter the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Tachis; Hegippier, Thanna; and William Tyrus, Tapius. It adjoyneth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Jeremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Josaph Idolatry.

Zaan, or Taphnes, was, in Mose's time, the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eufebius out of Atapannus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Aitonym in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharaoh the King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolamus, hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eufebius citeth. The Septuagint and the Vulgar Edition, for Zaan, write Heliopolis, Paginis, Volubis, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolome, Onion. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, toward the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easternmost branch of Nilus, falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be, that Heliopolis, to the South of the River Trojan, was the same which Atapannus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the same which Pomp. Melan and Plinius call Salis oppidum; Tyrinus in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians, Babalbeth; and Simon Sethi, Fons Salis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Phisphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Josaph married. In the Territory adjoining, Isach inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the High Priest of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to the Eternal God; not much inferior to that of Jerusalem (Ptolome Philopater, then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian 333 years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josaph fully reporteth hereunto, to have fulfilled a Prophecy of Esay, Chap. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terre Egypti; In ista die shall be the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes, at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jes remained, while Josaph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (faith Brocard) the Fountain is still found, called Jes Wad, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Egypt. And hence it is more in Brocard, in his Description of Egypt.

There is also that City of Noph, remembered by Elyan and Ezechiel, the same which Herod the Prophet calleth Noph; which later name it took from a Mountain adjoining, so called; which Mountain Herodotus remembereth. And this is that great City, which was called Momphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Misra. The Chaldeans name it Alababys; and Tadala Misraim.

Pelufium, which Varolabus, Paginis, Junius, and our G. Tyr. English, write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiat, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (faith Tyrinus) que olim dicta est Pelufium; Belbeis that in times past was called Pelufium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diophys. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Herodotus converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Babylus (for so Herodotus and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Phisphar.

To make the Story more perceivable, I have added a Description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembered in the Scripture: as of Taphnes, or Zaan, Heliopolis, or Eufebius, Balsamum, Succoth, and the rest; together with Mose's passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Story. For all Story, without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, is at watch a great part of the pleasure, for it noway enrichth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader: neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories, so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent; taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Aris Montanus; who, in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione recte agere narrantur, ac sine Topographica cognitione Historie leguntur, adeo confusae sunt perurbatae erunt omnia, ut ex illis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; Is narratum (faith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places wherein they were done; or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge, all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

SECT. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young Children in Egypt; and of Moses his Preference to Education.

BUT to return to the Story it self. It appeareth, that notwithstanding the labour and slavery which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh, considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male Children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, Quae praeant (faith Comitor) multitudini obsequium, quo sed comant (faith Comitor) order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For, to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had been a strange Parliamtent. Now, whether the two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diversly disputed. S. Augu- fine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exod. 1. 1. The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Josaphus, Ambrosius and Perrinus believe them to be Egyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the World might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding these Women filled with pity, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent: and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children born within his Dominions.

Now, besides the doubts which Pharaoh had of multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice which every King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have employed, or sent away, at his pleasure: Josaphus giveth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a child, who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation.

To prevent which (and predicting that he could not fulfil the Ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature, he stretched out his bloody and merciless hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spiritual Kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been temporal, he could all the male children at that time born, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of foreknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by his own words, in the tenth Verse of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply, and it come to pass, that if there be War, they pay themselves off unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told us from the beginning, how God doth the widom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkened, understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nile, being then a child, turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a sucking and powerful Infant. And this Prince having beheld the child, his form and beauty, though but yet in the bloom, perceived his compassion, as she did not only preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be educated as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, the child was called Moses, as it were, extraxit, or captus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water: or after, Josaphus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expressing Water: and Hier, as much as to say, as that which is drawn out of Water, or thence taken. Clement Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Freedom. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaoh's Daughter, and by men of the most understanding, taught and instructed: Quem regio more educavit, postea in spiritibus Egyptianum Magistris, a quibus eduxit, hinc hæd, into whom the great Prince education, appointing near him wife Moses of the Egyptians for his instructress. Thence (say Josaphus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth: And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom, or Science, such as it was, or at least of much thereof as Six Senensis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses and the reign of Josias.

SECT. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians of his War in Ethiopia; and of his Marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Pastoral life; and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

WHEN Moses was grown to mans estate, Josaphus and Enschier, out of Atarapius, tell us of ten years War that he made against the *Ethiopian*s, of the besieging of Seba, afterward by Cambyses called Muc; and how he recovered the City by the favour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Ethiopia, whom he took to Wife. So hath Comitor a pretty tale of Moses, how after the end of that War, Tharbis refusing his return into Egypt, Moses, most skillful in Astronomy, caused two Images to be engraven in two precious Stones, whereof the one increased in memory, the other could forgetfulness: These he set in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself: which Ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, he began to neglect the love the bawdy Husband: and so Moses, without danger, returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the fourtieth year of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Country to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times, were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting of the Daughter of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of those, and a father-in-law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Country nearest Egypt, fit to return from so necessary to be known, because interjacent between Egypt and Judea, through which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented best served. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings Son, or an adopted child of great Pharaoh's Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, sitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of those poor Beasts only.

In that part of Arabia near Median, he continued 40 years; and though (as Philo in the Story of Moses lib. (obscurely) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert, he enjoyed himself: and being separate from the cares of the world, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also judging that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Eft enim (saith Plato) ars Pastoralis, quæ prælatum ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, quæque prælatum ad bellum, ingenia præexercens (as in vanatibus, experientia in feris, quæ potest in militia, & bello præferenda sunt; brutis prælatibus maxime exercitum, tam belli quæque pacis tempore. At vero præferenda manifestè peccat, habetque in se, cum prælatum in subditis idcirco Reges cognominantur Pastores regna in subditis idcirco Reges cognominantur Pastores popularum, non consumunt, sed honoris gratia: The art of keeping Sheep, as it were, an introductory exercise to a Kingdom, namely, the ruling over men, the most gentle flock; Even as warlike natures do before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild beasts the things which after they will accomplish in warfare: these brute beasts affording matter whereon to train themselves both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattle, hath a kind of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over subjects: therefore Kings are styled Shepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in the time of his abode at Median, wrote the Book of Job, as Perrinus supposeth. I can not judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Perrinus opinion, that Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Perrinus conjecture. That by the example of Job's patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrews: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plenty, promised.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh that he was the Messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and there in to treat of all the particulars therein contained, is needless. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught of God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent: he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being Nature. Out of which he derived him in the first part of his Answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest; and in his second, to be understood by all. For, there is nothing that is, or hath being of it self, but the Eternal: which truly is, which is above all, which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment; their substance waxes and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same, in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay: neither doth any thing abide in one state. *Una est Dei, & sola natura que verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed suum est. Cetera que creata sunt, etiam videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit: It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seem to be, yet they are not: for sometimes they were not, and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in respect of the divine Nature, the saying of Zeno Eleuter excellently agreeth: Totâ rem natura umbra est, aut inanitas, aut fallax: The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitful: in comparison of whom (saith Euseb) in all Nations are nothings, less than nothing, and meer*

Of the ten Plagues wherewith the Egyptians were strucken, the first was by changing the Rivers into blood; God punishing them by those waters, into which their forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be aptly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast; and lastly, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drink. Apoc. 16. 6.

Thence of the Plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps; by the death of their Cattel; by poisonous Scabs; by Hail and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknes; after which, Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer than the pain and peril lasted; till such time as his own swift-bon, and the swift-bon of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his own life (a time wherein we remember God performe) stood upon no condition; whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; and then of the men, women, and children, reserving their bettials but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being past) he suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For, when everyone of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moses received) slain a Lamb, without spot or blemish, for the Passover (a Sacrament of the most clean and supported Saviour) and with the blood thereof coloured the post and lintern of the doors: the Angel of God in the night smote every first-born of Egypt, from the Son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave, the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible judgement of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did, in after-times, imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites used after the Passover; ascribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not only mark their Sheep and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning, and other harms.

SECT. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites; and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

NOW, when the people were removed, and on their way (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the frame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoils of his people, and in despite of himself. And having before this time great Companies of Soldiers in readiness, he consulted with himself, what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and easiest passage was through the Country of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and (in all probability) of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to find some other out-let, to wit, through the Desert of Ethiopia; and therefore, towards the Country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel,

Cattel, he thought impossible for the Israelites to encamp them that way. In the mean while, having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and six hundred of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gofon, which way fewer they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp bows on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kind of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the War for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharab, Josaphath affirmed, that it consisted of 50000 Horse, and 20000 Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharab intended long before to attack the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gofon; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might join themselves to his Enemies within the Land; or, being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the Plagues which God grieved him withal, enforced him, at this time, to give an assent to their departure; perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josaphath partial in this affair, yet, by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moser made but three days march, ere Pharab was at his heels; and yet the last day, he went on sixteen miles: which in so hot a Country, and to drive their Cattel and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerful Enemy at hand. Now, as Moser well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprises; so he lay not still in the Ditch, crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wise Man, and a valiant and Skillful Conductor; as by all his Actions and Councils, from this day to his Death, well appeared.

When Moser perceived that Pharab was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Ypsa of the Passover, he appointed a general Assembly, or Konvent of all the Hebrews at the dispersed Hebrews; and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as Moser after they had of Dough, and Pate, not staying to make it into Bread; knowing then that Pharab was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharab's Horse-Men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moser was utterly unprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramfess East-ward, towards the Defarts of Elsam, and encamped at Sasob; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Month Abib, which Month, from that time forward, they were commanded to account as the first Month of the Year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their Year in some other Month, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now re-called by Moser to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their Politick Year, which was now abrogated, but rather, by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was continued, and still continued in use.

Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, middle, or ending of the Year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick Year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every Month, and the whole form of their Year, like enough it is, that Moser himself in forty Years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust; but that any rule of framing their Kalender was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now, because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to show here, at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew Year; with the difference between them and other Nations, in ordering the account of Time.

SECT. VI.

Of the Solar and Lunar Years; and how they are reconciled; with the form of the Hebrew Year, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Months are thus named.

The First Month, Nisan, or Abib.	1. March.
II. Iyar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.	2. April.
III. Sivan, or Sinan, or Sion.	3. May.
IV. Tamuz.	4. June.
V. Ab.	5. July.
VI. Elul.	6. August.
VII. Tisri, or Elshavin, or Elshanin.	7. September.
VIII. Marchesvan, or Mechshan, or Bx, or with Josaphath , Morshan.	8. October.
IX. Chislev, or Caslev.	9. November.
X. Tebeth, or Thobeth.	10. December.
XI. Sebeth, or Sabeth.	11. January.
XII. Adar, and Fe Adar.	12. February.

VE Adar, was an intercalary Month, added some years unto the other twelve, to make the Solar and Lunar Year agree; which (besides the general inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by calling the Months of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed special Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Month of the Year, and withall on a set day, both of the Month, and of the Month: as the Feast of the First-fruits, the New-Moons, and the like; which could not have been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in some other part of the Month, or the Month it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the Year.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances (which is the principal commodity of time that is, the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more days, as the error committed in foregoing Years required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of days made up a complete Year. For though by the continual course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough, even to the most favage of all People, when a Year hath passed over them;

them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole Years insufficient for the final record of more daily Affairs. Therefore Men observed the Monthly conspicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the Year into twelve parts, subdividing the Month into twenty nine Days and Nights, and those again into their Quarters and Hours. But as the marks of Time are fenible and easily discerned; so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing less time by eleven days, or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sun through the Zodiac, in the space of sixteen Years, every Month was found in the quite contrary part of the Year to that where in it was placed at the first. This caused them to add some days to the Year, making it to consist of twelve Months, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any set number of whole days; neither did the Moon change always at one Hour; but the very Minutes and lesser Fractions were to be observed by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions all were not still alike) into any certain rule.

Here lay much Wisdom, and deep Art, which could not soon be brought to perfection. Yet, as making an eliminate at random, the Athenians held the Year to contain three hundred and sixty days; wherein most of the Greeks concurred with them. That three hundred and sixty days filled up the Grecian Year (besides many collateral proofs) it is manifest by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in the honour of Demetrius Phalerus, which were (saith he) 360, whilst as yet the Year exceeded not that number of days. By this account, neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their Months; neither could their Months continue many Years in their own places; but must needs be shifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the days forgotten to be inserted into the Almanack by Men, but not forgotten by the superior Bodies in their courses, should occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian Games was to be held at the full Moon, and withall on the fifteenth day of the Month Heurambes (which answered in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this Month might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding some two days to the last Month of every Year; those Games being held once in four Years. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them sometime to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the second of the Month Bedomion (agreeing nearly with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunar Year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Month of June would every Year have grown colder and colder; had they not sought to keep all upright, by intercalating into each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth Year, one whole Month, which they called the second Pafdon, or Demetris; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Month of twenty nine days, another of thirty days, and so successively through the whole Year. Thus, with much labour, they kept their Year, as near as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these marks, which they observed, were found at length to be deceitful guides. For it was not possible to fashion this eighth Years intercalation, that it should not deceive them in eleven hours and eighteen minutes at the least, or some ways in thirty four Hours and ten Minutes, or thirty fix and forty one Minutes; which differences, would in few Ages have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Mason the Athenian, who, not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth Years intercalation, devised a Cycle of nineteen years, within the Moon, having 235 times run out her circuit, met with the Sun in the same place, and on the same day of the Year; as in the nineteenth Year before past he had done. This invention of Mason, was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalender in Golden Letters, being called, The Golden Number; which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of seven Months in the nineteen Years, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one Year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle seven Hours, and some Minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle, containing four of Mason's, that is to say, seventy fix Years; and afterwards, Hipparchus, a noble Astronomer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former Observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalender, was that which Julius Caesar made, who, by advice of the best Mathematicians then to be found, examining the courses of those Heavenly Bodies, reduced the Year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365 Days and six Hours, which Hours in four Years make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth Year, the 24 of February. The correction of the Julian Year by Pope Gregory the 13th, Anno Dom. 1582, is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeed used by a Note added unto the Work of Caesar; yet a Note of great importance to: For whereas it was observed, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, An. Dom. 325, entered the Aequinoctial on the twenty one day of March, was in the Year 1583 ten days sooner taken, in that time Pope Gregory struck out of the Kalender ten days, following the fourth of October; so that in stead of the fifth day, was written the fifteenth; by which means the movable Feasts depending on the Sun's entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in their true time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence-forward, in every hundred Year, the Leap-day should be omitted, excepting till the fourth hundred; because the Sun doth not in his yearly course take up full six hours above the 365 days; but faileth by many minutes, as in 400 years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of twenty nine Years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nicety of hours, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the days of the whole Year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out, that always the Kalends, or first day of the Month, was at the new Moon; and because that day was Festival, they were very careful, as well to observe the short Year of the Moon, passing through all the twelve Signs in one Month, as that longer of the the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave to Nisan, their first Month, which is about our March, or April, thirty days; to Iar, their second Month twenty nine days; and to Iueidiv thirty to one, twenty nine to another. Hence it came to pass, that twenty two Months of theirs contain'd somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing twenty nine days twelve hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous, or Ephat days; which made up seven Months in nineteen years; to fix of which seven were commonly given thirty days, to one of them twenty nine days, or otherwise, as was found requisite. Their common Year (as appeared by the several days of each Month) contained 354 days, which fall of the Year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, eleven whole days, with some Fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one Year, yet in the Cycle of nineteen Years, were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that fill at the end of the Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day of the Year, Month, and Week, yea, commonly on the same Hour of the Day, where they had been at the beginning of it nineteen years before.

Sir, duty, Heb. lib. 3. cap. 1. Divers have diversely set down the form of the Hebrew Year, with the manner of their intercalations.

Steganius tells us, that every second Year, they did add a Month of twenty two days; every fourth Year a Month of twenty three in regard of eleven days and a half wanting in twelve Months, to fulfil a Year of the Sun. But Isaac Steganius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in twenty two or twenty three days; and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the Year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the Months in the Years following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon. Giesebrand faith, that every third Year, or second Year, as need required, they did intercalate one Month, adding it at the years end unto the other twelve. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the Years the intercalation was (if it be worthily of consideration) me-thinks they do not properly deliver, who keep all far from covenants, until the very last of the nineteen Years. For (to omit such as are grossly) from there are who say, that after three Years, when besides the days spent in thirty six courses of the Moon, thirty three days are left remaining, that is eleven days of each Year; then did the Hebrews add a Month of thirty days; keeping three days, as it were, in plussage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth Year; at which time, besides the intercalary Month, remained six days, namely, three surmounting that Month, and the Ephat of three Years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the eighteenth Years; at which time they have eighteen days in hand; all which, with the Ephat of the nineteenth Year, make up a Month of twenty nine days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; but surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18th Year every Month were removed from his own place by the distance of 48 days, that is half a quarter of a Year and more; which inconvenience, by such a reckoning, was unavoidable. Whence I prefer the common opinion, which prevents such dissimulation of the Months, by fitting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the eighth Year. For the six days remaining after the two former intercalations made in the third and sixth Years, added unto the twenty two days, arising out of the Ephat of the seven and eight Years, do so fill, as to make up a Month, with the borrowing of one day or two from the Year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the Year triflingly vary the less from the proper season of every Month. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Months and Years, by which they guided their Accounts.

SECT. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red-Sea; and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FROM Succoth, in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Eihim, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of that Wilderness, though he intended nothing less than to go out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horfe-Men and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himself from being encompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Eihim he halted but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia, being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects: the first two, natural, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, persuaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not of two Millions of Souls (for it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly pass over those Defart and high Mountains with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that fatness he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest number of them. For these his own words, They are tangled in the Land, the wilderness hath shut them in, do show his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Ramessis: from whence (inilling Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of Horfe and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses's confidence in the All-powerful God was such, by whose Spirit, only wife, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600,000 men, to call the success upon his own understanding, with conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Eihim towards the Valley of Phibzerath, sixteen miles distant; and fate down between two ledges of Mountains adjoining to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Eihim on the North, and Bazilephon towards the South; the time which Onias callith Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple, dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius notices, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as Climax is Dominus specula, five cogitatio; Lord of the watch-tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arrest them, and force them to return to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Egyptii dii fauendi: The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, faith S. Hieron. But Moses, who encompassed at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or, as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the Watch-tower asleep, or out of countenance.

Dominus

Now, these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm Land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusion and Cafotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Eihim, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the Valley of Phibzerath, between the Mountains, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horfe-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but got fight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wath of the Sea; in so much as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's sudden approach, began to despair and to mutiny at that time when it behoved them most to have taken courage for their own defence's laying it to Moses charge, that themselves forelaw those perils in which they were w-apped. And fear, which, faith the Book of Wisdom, is the berying of God's succours which reason offends, made them both despair in God's former Promises, and to be forgetful of their own strength and multitudes.

SECT. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea; and of the Red Seas self.

BUT Moses, who feared nothing but God himself, he perfwaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those that assuredly trusted in him using this comfortable and reolved speech: Fear not, &c. For the Egyptians whom ye have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which, Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on, in these words; Wherefore cryest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward; and lift thou up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God in the dark of the night, finding the sands uncovered, pass on towards the other side and coast of Arabia; two parts of the night being spent ere he entered the Ford, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern Wind, and by Moses Rod, to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written, The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them; and the Pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein, either by his immediate Power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning-watch, Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side; and Pharaoh (as the dawn of the day began to enlighten the obscure air) finding a beginning of the Sea's return, hasted himself towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his Rod, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea, moved by the power of God, ran back to its place, the Land with unreluctant fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For, it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with fear of death, ran one a-thwart another, and running the path by which they had pass on after the Hebrews, their wheels stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawn out; the Sea coming against them with supernatural violence.

Lysanias, upon Exod. 14. and others, following the Opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the Children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Amnadaab, Prince, or Leader of the Tribe of Judah, first made the adventure; and therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the Prophecy of Isaiah, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers Sons shall bow down unto thee, But Hieron, upon Hosea 11. condemns this Opinion: And though it be true, that Judah had the first place in all their miracles in the Desert, and, as we now call it, led the Van-guard (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet, that Moses himself was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, it is written in the 77th Psalm; Thou didst lead thy people, like Sheep, by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe pass over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135 Psalm, according to the vulgar: Divisit Mare Rubrum in divisiones; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became a green Field, or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulenfis, and Genebrand, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written, Psalm 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy way; and in the last Book of Wisdom, verf. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now, this Sea, through which Moses pass, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Chloene, perished in the 16th year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differething at all in natural colour from other Waters. But, as Philostratus in his third Book noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entrench at a narrow rift, between Arabia the Happy, and Aethiopia, or the Land of the Abyssinians: the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Platony callith Possidom, to the other Land of Aethiopia, hath not above six leagues in breadth, and the same also filled every where with Islands, but afterwards it extendeth it self 88 leagues from coast to coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Porosa on one side, and Aethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Suez, the utmost end and indraught of that Sea; where the Turk now keeps his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf; but the North part towards Suez, and where Moses pass, is called Hoplotites, of the City Hera, sometime Troy, and of later times Suez. Pliny calls it Gambifia, by which name it was known, fifth he, before it was called Hera, many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apoena, Eccaron, and Suez. Artemidorus the North, Apoena, Eccaron, and Suez. Artemidorus others wites it Zeleniticon; King Jubal, Leonticus's others

more properly, Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana, which the Separingit call Elath; Prolema, Elana, Pliny, Leua; Josaphus, Ilana; and Marius Niger, Alia: there is also Ilath in Affrica, to which Salmanassar carried the Israelites captive, 2 King. 8. 11, which Ilath in Affrica, the Separingit call Elath; and in the part of Chron. 5. Ala. But, as for the Red Sea, on the terms thereof, thus diversely named, the Moor, and Arabians (Vallais to the Turk.) know it by noother appellation, than the Gulf of Mecca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythraean, of a King called Erythra, or Erythraeus: and because Erythra in the Greek signifieth Red; hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraeus, the Son of Peplus and Andromeda, it took the name of the Red Sea, as Quintus Curtius conjectureth; which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it seems to me, by the view of a Discovoy of that Sea, in the year 1544, performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East-India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of ardeurs, both from the banks, cliffs, and Gales of many Islands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For, I find by the report of Gama, a principal Commander under Gama (which Discourse I gave Mr. Richard Hakluyt to publish) that there is an Island called Dalagui, sometime Legues, containing in length 25 leagues, and 12 in breadth; the earth, founts, and cliffs, of which Island, being of a reddish colour, force for a foil to the waters about it, to make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Gama reporteth, that from 24 degrees of Sepentrional latitude to 27 (which make in length of Coast 180 miles), lying as it doth, Northernly and Southerly all the cliffs, and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams give a kind of reddish lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea, towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, of which the greatest fount of Coral grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Islands of this Sea many red Trees, fairs, Synths, and those, growing under water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shadow of these stones, founts, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in many places it seemeth to be such; which Johannes Barro in his second Decade, eighth Book, and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion-Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient Geographers Sinus Elaniticus, which walseth the coasts of Madian, or Midian, is for 16 or 17 leagues together, along Northward toward Suez, some three leagues, or 5 English miles over, and from that Port about 25 leagues, of which, the first 26 have 9 miles breadth, as afore said, and afterward, the Lands, both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and strengthen it, so that, as for 6 miles together, it is not above 3 miles over; from thence upward the Land on Egypt side fallth away, and makes a kind of Bayes Cove, for some 10 miles together, after which the Land grows upon the Sea again, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at 4 miles breadth, or there about, in which Tract it was that Moses past over, though others would have it to be over against Elana, or Toro, but without judgment; for from Ramses to Pharaboth, and Baalzepon, there is not above 30 miles interjacent, or 35 miles at most, which Moses past over in three days; and between the Land of Egypt, opposite to Elana, or Toro, the distance is above 80 miles. For Ramses, to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharab at Zaan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30 degrees 5 minutes of Sepentrional latitude; and Migdol, or the Valley of Pharaboth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzepon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying, in effect, North and South.

S E C T. IX.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebb.

The Egyptians, and of them the Momphites, and other Heathen Writers, who, in hatred of the Hebrews, have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebb, upon a great Spring-tide, and that Pharab, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place, with other circumstances. For, not to borrow trifles from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly Wind, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that believe not therein, perfwadeth nothing) I say, that by the same natural reason unto which they falsified themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary, and casual, then could not Pharab and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For whereforever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land, as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to the dry Land. Now, Moses entering the Sea at Migdol under Baalzepon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Suez, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water 10 or 12 miles farther into the Sea than Suez, and between it and where Moses past, who entered the same low below it, and towards the body of the same Sea; it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve, or Strait, had been by the ebb of a Spring-tide discovered, when Pharab found the flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his retreat before the tide, on his right hand; and so taken ground again at the end of the Sea, at Suez it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharab, by any return of waters, could not have perished, as he did; and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to return back by a strong East-Wind, do rather prove the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebb more than ordinary; for that Sea did not fly East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North-West wind, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-East into the Sea. But the East-Wind blew a-thwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof, the other part remained toward Suez, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharab; while he was cheet by that Sea, which used in times before to ebb away, the flood preit him, and over-welmd him. Thirdly, seeing Josaphus avoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent judgment, generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the Zethians in battles, being employed by Pharab, and wan divers Cities, becoming impragable; it were barbarous to condemn him of the grossest, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardness of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded to take that way, and fore-told him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharab), he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharab might have found him, and put him, as well when it flowed, as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharab's approach, cried out against Moses, and despised altogether of their falsity; and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God; Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward, and lift thow up thy Rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at that time of Pharab's approach any ebb at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters by a strong East-Wind, whereby the Lands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Suez, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the Waters were a Wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path, not that the Waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the School-men have fancied. For, had Pharab and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgment, that can think, that Pharab and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Country, on his own Coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein, his people having had many hundreds of years experience of the Tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any fore-known or natural Accident, but by God's powerful Hand only; which then fallth most heavily on all men, when, looking through no other spectacles but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been over-taken by the ordinary return of the flood, before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood, which runneth up to Suez, and to the end of the Sea, and not have been cast a-shore on the coast of Arabia, where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzepon, on Arabia side; where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them; which flood doth not any where cross the Channel, and run a-thwart it, as it must have done from Egypt into Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea; and to which their carcases should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius, in the lives of the Fathers, affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which layed in the Country, and did not follow Pharab in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those beasts, birds, plants or other creatures, about which they were builded at the time of Pharab's destruction; as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a God of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied, and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Origen, in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400 years after Christ, the prints of Pharab's Chariot-wheels were to be seen at a low water, on the Egyptian lands; and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But herof I leave every man to his own belief.

C H A P. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them; with a discourse of Laws.

S E C T. I.

A transcription, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie; with a continuation of the Story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

But to go on with the Story of Israel, in this fort I recall'd the times. Moses was born in the Year of the World, 2424. Saphron then governing Affrica; Orthopis, Sycania, or Peloponnesus; Crisp, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Dacalion, Thebly. He fled into Midian, when he had lived forty years, in the Year of the World, 2474; and two years after that was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the year, 2514, the last Month of the Year. On the fourteenth day of the first Hebrew Month Abib, or the fifteenth of that Month, beginning the day (as they) at Sun-setting, in the Year of the World, 2514 was the celebration of the Passover; and in the dead of the night of the same day, were all the first-born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. the fifteenth day of the first Month

At this Mantion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 25th Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that Book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the rest of that Chapter. Whereof (because there is no Story nor other Passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speak somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and use thereof; whereby, if the Reader find the Story any way disjointed, he may turn over a few leaves, and, omitting this, the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, level, and square of Laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfullest man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquests. For, as the North Star is the most fixed Director of the Sea-man to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the Guide and Conductor of all in general to the haven of eternal life. The Law of Nature, from God his eternal Law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures is the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and virtuous Men; yea, the very spirit, and the very sinews of every Estate in the World, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just Law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Mind without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This becometh the divine, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Laws were honoured as Gods, or, as the Sons of Gods: and the rest, that made either additions, or corrections, were commended to all Posterity for men of no less virtue, and no less liberally beneficial to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerors that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one; as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedæmonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solon; the Romans, sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senators, from their Luneyers, and from the peoples themselves: others from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

SECT. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not always taken alike, but is diversely, and in an indifferent sense used. For, if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the Rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or, it is taken for any private Ordinance of Superiours, or Inferiours: for the Commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their Decrees do usually surpass that Title, according to the general acceptance of the word Law: of which Eph. 3. 2, It is now that these wicked Decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the People. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Laws, though evil and insufficient: Mala lex est, que tumultuaria posita est: It is an evil Law that is made tumultuously. So as all Ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws.

The word Law is also taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the Law of the flesh, which the Divines call legem fœnalis, is to be understood. For every Law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sense, as elsewhere, this moral habit or disposition of the heart, is called the frame, or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law; But I see another Law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my mind, and leading me captive into the Law of Sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures, are sometime called (a) Laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the Law eternal; as the Law of a Leop. to be fierce or valiant.

All private contracts among Merchants, and other Trades-men, do often put on the name of Laws. But Law, commonly and properly, is taken for a right Rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Civil Community. The rest, also it is have not the common good for their ends, but being tal, they are leges inique, are by Thomas called violentiæ leges, quæ leges non sunt, sed compulsionis tantum: And whatsoever Leges and is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for Laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, que nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt: The Scripture useth constitutions of men, which are neither to be termed Laws, nor leges. For, faith Aristotle, Legalitas iustitia called the just Legalitas, & conformitas fœlicitatis: Just Laws are the workers and performers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, faith Plato, is God, and his Worship: Finis legis Dei & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines: Legendo, or, a ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lictæ & ad populum late, faith Varro: For, after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, a ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as conferunt jugum, divergent vincla: they have broken the yoke, they have broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincla eorum, & projiciamus a nobis funes israhel: Let us break their bands asunder, and let us cast away their cords from us.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God; and because of God's peoples voluntary subjection of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, use the word diabolum, a Testament, or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator: for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force, as Heb. 9. 17, it is said, Testamentum in morte ratum est.

The Hebrews call the Law Thorah, of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nomus, of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his own due; the power of the Law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium Legis, imperium Dei est: The reign of the Law, is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vite regula, præcipiens que sunt sequenda, & que fugienda:

sequenda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or, Lex est omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen, or Princess of things both humane and divine. But this description is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable Law. The very wisdom of Nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent; and the rule of right and wrong. For, as a right line is called, Index Juri, & curvi, the demonstration of it self, and of the crooked; so is the Law the judge and measure of right and wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodness of operation; and though Law, as touching the substance and essence, consists in understanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehendeth the act of our will. The word Jus is also diversely taken, as sometime for the matter of the Law, and for common right: sometime for the Law it self, as Jus civile, or Jus gentium. Idcirco distinguitur the two general words, Jus and Fas; whereof Jus, faith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, Jus lex humana. To go over another man's field is permitted by Gods Law, not by Mans; and therefore in a thing out of controversy Virgil useth both these words: as Fas & jura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Jus, or Right, is derived or taken from the old Substantive Nomus jussus, a bidding or commandment: or, perhaps, from the Greek Zeus, which is the name of Jupiter, or of the Latine Genitive case Jovis; because, as the Scripture speaks, the judge is God. For, as it is certain that jur-jurandum is come of Jovis-jurandum (for so we find it written in Nomus out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it juramentum Jovonis): so also we may say, that Jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis est; because as God is the Author, and Pattern, and Maintainer of Right, so also in his Viceregents, the Magistrate, he is the Pronouncer and Executor of Right. Of this Jus the just are denominated, Justus à Jure, and Justitia à Juslo: The Right gives name to the Righteous; and Justice takes her name from the Just.

SECT. V.

Of the definition of Law, and of the Law eternal.

But, because Laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean, those sorts of Laws from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane Laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

Eternal, or uncreated.

Natural, National, or Internal.

Laws imposed, or imposed, or of addition, or of common, or of perfective, or of the law called positive.

1 Divine, which hath two parts.

2 Humane, which is also twofold.

Written. The written is also double, The Gospel.

Unwritten. As the Doctrine and Religion of the Patriarchs before the written Law of Moses, which some call Cabala.

Written. Which Cicero in his second Book of Invention calleth Jus Legitimum, and divided into the Ecclesiastical, and Secular.

Unwritten. As the Laws of Custom and Use.

The Law Eternal is thus defined by Thomas. Lex æterna est æterna divine sapientie conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præordinatarum. The eternal Law is the eternal concept of God's Wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or, Lex æterna est summa atque æterna ratio divine sapientie: quatenus res omnes ad determinatum finem sua dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat: It is high and eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity, according to their several natures, or conditions. Now, the difference lies in this: That as the flame divine understanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called Providence: but, as it imposeth a necessity, according to the nature of all things which it directeth, so it is called a Law.

Of this Eternal Law Cicero took knowledge, when in his Book of Laws he wrote in this manner: Erant ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & a delicto avocans: que non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est, sed tum orta est. Orta autem fuit ex eum mente divina: quomobrem lex vera atque principis, opta ad juvendum & ad vitandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things, encouraging or impelling to rightful actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (faith he) then begin to be a Law when it was written, but when it had Being, Being, and beginning it had together with divine understanding; and therefore a true Law, and a fit Principle to command and forbid, is the right Reason of the most high God. This eternal Law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, for the reason of man finds it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one Law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another Law to men, another to other creatures having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal Law all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this Law all Laws are derived, as from the rule universal, and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternal, and the divine Law, differ only in the consideration; the eternal directing more largely: arg.

as well every creature, to their proper and natural ends, as it doth Man to his supernatural; but the divine Law to a supernatural end only: the natural Law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternal; as it were a stream from the fountain.

The Law humane or temporal is also thence drawn, in that it hath the form of right Reason; from which if it differ, it is then impositum iniquis, a wicked imposition; and only borroweth the name of a Law.

To this eternal Law all things are subjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, natural or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the Law also of things which are simple, natural and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: Hercules of heaven, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Drops: Fire and Hail, Snow and Vapour, fiery Winds which execute his Word: Mountains and Hills, fruitful Trees, and all Cedars: Beasts and all Cattle, &c. Now, as the reasonable creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity propoised unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures have in themselves, and in their own natures an obedience formal to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end propoised. For Beasts are led by sense, and natural instinct: things without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward; things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is appoised. This kind of working, the Arbitrarius ascribe to common Nature; others to Fate: a difference used in terms only: it being no other than God's general providence: for, as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived, thereunder subjected, thencefrom by his eternal Law and Providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heaven and on earth.

The School-men are very curious and ample in the consideration of these Laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But, as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thencefrom, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetitions, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For, according to S. Augustine, Lex eterna est, quae iustum est, ut omnia sint ordinata; the Law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal Law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not: for which S. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first Book of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the Law of Moses, which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Pedagogy of Gods people, or Introduction to Christ, should be expired; which time of expiration, some think our Saviour noted to come, when on the Cross he said, Consummatum est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour of Man having no other signification, than that now the Prophecy of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so S. John expounds it, when he saith, 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaret Scripturam, (That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the Law Ceremonial, and of so much of the Judicial, as appertaineth peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the New Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable Law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it; but the things prescribed change according to this eternal Ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Solomon, And being one, she can do all things, and remaining in her self, reneweth all.

SECT. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

OF the Law of Nature, as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the School-men; only as it is considered in Man, it is called The image of divine Light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reasonable creature. Lex Naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, et participatio Legis eternalis in rationali creatura. Thom. defines the natural Law to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Lex non dedit hominibus generis propriam, sed omnium animalium quae terra marique nascuntur, actionem quoque commune est. The Law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures, as well Birds, as to those the Land and Sea produce. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal Providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, enlightening our formal reason: so it is more than sense in Beasts; and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulls and Horses appear unto the sense more fearful and terrible, than the least kind of Dogs; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and fleeth from the other, yea, though by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it sense, which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Nests high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or of the Birds of India, to make their Nests on the smaller twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other parts of the Trees, or elsewhere, to save their Eggs and young ones from the Monkeys, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twig will not bear, and which would fear to fall into the Water. The instances in this kind are exceeding many and may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of Plants, that some Trees, as the female of Palmitus, will not bear any fruit, except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unsearchable Wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reason of Man hath made it self subject, and a Vassal to Passions, and Affections Brutal: and incorrupt, where time and custom hath bred in Men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which St. Augustine calleth the Law of Reason, but by a nature blinde and corrupted: that the Germans did antiently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters: that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to Men to use one another's Wife, and to the Women, to chide their others besides their Husband, to beget them with Child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Seythians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawful to bury with them the beiloved Wives: as also they have many other customs remembered by G. Valentinus, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Laws some Men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithless among the faithful: to provide for our selves by another Man's delinquency: that Injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of natural Laws, either out of St. Augustine, or Aquinas (the one calling it the impression of divine Light; the other, the discrete ordinance of practical Reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and uprightness: and not to offend or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For, such is the Law of Nature to the Mind, as the Eye is to the Body; and that which, according to David, thenceforth is good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternal life: though of themselves not sufficient without Faith and Grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the Law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of God's divine light in Men, and a participation of the Law increased and eternal. For without any Law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God and distribution of right to Men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For about the Gentiles (saith St. Paul)

Rom. 1.11. which have not the Law, do by nature those things contained in the Law: they having not the Law, are a Law unto themselves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all Men, which we define should be done unto us, is an effect of the pure Reason; in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of Conscience hath made her resting-place and habitation: In ea altissima rationis quiete habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) which have the effect of the Law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: and do reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a Law unto himself (while he is, thenceforth to abuse the World by the advantage of hypocrisy, worketh nothing evil, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt Hearts from the World's Eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite Eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the World, Sed Florulae, dum loquimur, arcescit: Those Flowers wither, while we discourse of their Colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearful Witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras: teach in this golden Precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum; maxime omnium cor teip-

sum. Commit nothing foul or dishonest, faith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own Heart: but above all Men, reprove thine own Conscience. And this may be a Precept of Nature and right Reason; by which Law, Man and all Creatures, and Bodies, are inclined to those Operations, which are antiverbal to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable Mind is the form of Man, so is he aptly moved to those things which his proper form pertaineth unto him; to wit, that which right Reason offereth; and the Acts of right Reason, are the acts of Virtue; and in the breach of the rules of the Reason, is a Man least excusable; as being a reasonable Creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first Creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in Nature: for it bringeth forth the seed of the Herb, which feedeth feed, &c. and the Seed, which liveth thereon. He gave a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds; which they obey. He made a decree for the Rain, and a way for the Lightning of the Thunder. He caused the Sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for signs, and for seasons. Were there as rebellious as Man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once break the Law of their natures and forms: the whole World would then perish, and all return to their first Chaos, darkness, and confusion.

By this natural Law, or Law of humane Reason, did Cain perceive his own wickedness and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but thereupon of Men, it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doings was pure to our natures by God, and his eternal Law, before the Law was written, Moses in the person of God witnessed, Gen. 4. If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, sin lieth at thy door.

The School-men are large also in this Question of the natural Law; the same being opened apud by Rodericus, Antonius, and Valentinus. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this Subject.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth An act of Reason taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practical reason; they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that Good is to be followed, and Evil disfavoured) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more universal propositions. Again, as it antiverbal the natural appetite, preferring things to be defined as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the first, to desire to live, and to fight he hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every Man there are three sorts of Appetites, which answer the three degrees of natural Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, as also the desire of life, with care to provide for them: for the Father, after his death, lives in his Children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of Children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable Laws of Nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all Creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as Man is a Being, Ens or Res; so he doth desire good, and thus evil. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their own nature, is to desire their own good. And is good, which is desired by Animals, to be that which all desire. Which definition Rashi upon the 44. Psalm approacheth: Rece quoniam homines desiderant, quia omnia expectant recte bene sunt. Men desired good, or goodly, to be that which all things desire.

The second kind of Appetite, is of those things which appertain unto us, as we have fence. Whence, by the Law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glut us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For, as Seneca it felt is for the preservation of life and being; so it meet, even by the Law of Nature, that the sensitive Appetite should not carry us to the destruction either of our life or being. And although (saying both these kinds of appetites are in Beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath given divers Laws unto them: In which sense the Gentians desire natural Right, or Jus naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living Creatures: Yet the School-men admit not, that the instincts of Beasts can properly be called a Jus, but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every Law. For to they distinguish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living Creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living Creatures in general, from the right belonging to Men; calling the one Jus Naturae, the other Jus Gentium: the Divines understand the Law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine Reason, both in Beasts and Men; and restrain the Law of Nations to a kind of humane Right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living Creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the Laws of this Appetite are the Commandments of our Religion.

Now, although there are many other branches and divisions of this Law of Nature answering the division of matter, which it preceiveth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the Law of Nature but one Law, according to Aquinas's hint, because it hath one Fountain or Root in the natural or motive Faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this Law of Nature binds all Creatures, it is manifest, and chiefly Man; because he is endued with Reason: in whom as Reason groweth, so this band of observing the Law of Nature increaseth. Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, transiit quod scriptum est, Adveniente mandato, peccatum revocatur: When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass which was written by St. Paul, When the commandment came, sin reviveth. Neither is it a small warrant for this Law of Nature, when those that break the same, are said by St. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate sense (or mind): to do those things which are not convenient: And again, that their consciences bear witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For though this Law of Nature stretch not to every particular: as to command fasting, and the like: yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to Right and Reason.

And therefore said Damasceus: Homines facti sunt multi, desideranda in id quod contra naturam est; ut homo. Men (saith he) are made evil, by declining unto things which are contrary to Nature: And St. Augustine, Omne creaturæ naturæ necesse est, per hoc contra naturam est; Every creature's duty wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this Law of Nature so freight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For, whereas by this Law, all Men are born Lords of the Earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all Men shall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of Justice and Equity.

And though the Law of Nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some cases, this law the fullestness to be broken: as to deny a mad Man his Weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the Universal principles can no more be changed, than the Decrees of God are alterable: as according to St. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

SECT. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

AFTER the Eternal, and Natural, the Law Positive, or imposed is the next in order, which is called Law, being nothing but an addition, or rather an explication of the former, hath two kinds: Divine, and Humane. Again, the Divine positive Law is doubles the Old, and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai, or Horeb, at such time as the World had stood 2513 whole years: and in the 67 day of this year, when as Absolutes, or Afades governed the Abyssinians, Muraton the Syeonians, Triop the Argives, Ceropt Attica, and Acheres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430 years. And this, it seems, was the first written Law which the World received. For the very word Nomus, signifying a Law, was not then, nor long after, invented by the Greeks: no, not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy eighty years at least: and Troy it self was called down 335 years after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to engrave in Stone, that it might remain a lasting Book of his expressed Will in the Church: and that the Priests and People might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel though bred among an Idolatrous People in Egypt might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us, why this Law was not written before, is, that when the People were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might call, without any written Law, instruct their own Children; and yet as they increased, so doubts they had, besides the Law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, for as much as the Law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular; nor sufficiently terrify the consciences of offenders; nor so expound Divine Worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, ten, and set before the eyes of all Men; which before, they might, but would not, read in their own Consciences. The School-men, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written; whereof these are the chiefest.

The first for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The Law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Souls: The Testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to Children. For, the humane Law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offenses, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profits; but the divine Law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore, by David, it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the Laws of Men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words, converting our Souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists: Actioes hominum nulle essent, nisi prius in mente discernatur. The actions of Men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the Mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of Truth, which by reason of diversity of Opinion, and difference of peculiar Laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of God bindeth all Men, and is without error; and therefore also said David, That the Testimony of the Law of God is faithful, giving Wisdom to Children.

SECT. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of Time, between the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of God were left altogether to the Law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself; and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos; from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea, many particular Commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio: Precepts received from the Mouth of their Priests and Elders; to which the Jews after the Law written, added the interpretation of secret Mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the Divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to their Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The Commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding, they were sufficiently known. For, finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adameh, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the Ground or Foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain; and English signifieth Man, or miserable &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all Fruits but the forbidden; and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted, all Men thence-after being commanded to co-habit with their Wives, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That Murder and Cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood it felt, is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood. For God said unto Noah, And end of this world is come before me; for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the Earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all specially, that perished: God's Mercy and Justice interposing between the Untaught and Revenge. This Commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters but a repetition of that which was said before: Who sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed; for in the Image of God hath He made Man.

Also the Law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the Father's curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a Servant of Servants shall he be unto his Brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of Sodom was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from Heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the Law no less detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dina's forcing; and by the judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, that she should be burnt; and by the repentance of Pharao and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a Man's Wife. To these we may add the Ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean Beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise up Seed to his Brother that left a Widow Childless, and divers other Constitutions, partly Moral, and partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written Law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called, The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the Hearts of Men, before it was engraven in Stone, but also in substance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For, as St. Paul witnesseth of himself, I know not sin, but by the Law: to ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the Creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten Law: the Angels intuitively; Men, by Reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative Powers; and things Inanimate, by their necessary motions, without sense or perception.

SECT. IX.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a note prefixed, how the Scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW, as the word [Law] in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain to the Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by St. Paul diversly; as sometime for the Old Testament; as, Now we know that whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law.

When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets and Prophets, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses: For so St. Luke hath distinguished them; All must be fulfilled, which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial; as, Therefore we conclude, that a Man is justified by Faith, without the work of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of God's wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the Law, and Summum Jus: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or Signs are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like; in that it signifieth but shadows and figures; as, The Law was given by Moses, but Grace and Truth came by Jesus Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ's coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jews Common-wealth; as, Before Faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the Order and Institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Priests, &c. photos and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word [Law] is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interit, Authority, and Empire, or for continuing forces; as, The Law of the Spirit, &c. Spirit of Life, the Law, or the force of sin and death, the Law, &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of Men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holiness and Justice, promising eternal life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the Law, and threatening Death to those which break the Law in the least. For, according to St. James, Whoever shall keep the whole Law, and fail in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the School-men, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex dicitur est divinum decretum hominibus preceptis mandata necessarium, ut apte pervenire possint ad supernam vitam, quod est ultimum bonum, et vitæ finis, the divine Law (that is) is the Decree of God, prescribing unto Men a necessary mean, whereby they may aptly attain supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of Man's Life.

The Law of Moses hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the Law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral Law entreateth of Virtue and Goodness; the Ceremonial of divine Service, and of Holiness; (for external Worship, and the order of hallowing our selves unto God, is called Ceremony) and the Judicial teacheth the particular Government, for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for Justice and Equity. And therefore was it said of St. Paul, The Commandment is just, holy, and good: Just, or Justice being referred to Judicial: Holy, or Holiness to the Ceremonials; Good, or honest, to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the Government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such things were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong Beasts, and the Fruits of the Earth; to Holy things, the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certain Meats, as not to eat the Blood and fat of Beasts; or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifying, anointings, and attire; as not to wear mix'd Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnatural and unproper communion; as, Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Ox and an Ass, or call mingled Seed in one Field. It also exhorted to natural compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty, even to Beasts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the Creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to Man. For to some refer these Precepts, Thou shalt not kill the Bird sitting on her Nest, nor beat down the Ends of the Tree, nor muzzle the Labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respect the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Moral liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away; saving in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God; and to use charity one towards another; which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done; which power of directing by special Rules and Precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial also lived in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it self is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; although in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a far less degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Judicial liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the natural and universal Equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of Justification, the Ceremonial as touching the use and external observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the Ceremonies were signs and shadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-wealth and Policy.

SECT.

SECT. X.

A Proposal of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

AS for that which remaineth in general consideration of the divine Written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The propriety and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The fence and understanding of the Law.
9. The duration and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by St. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three Attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver is approved in all his creatures; who, as he hath given all things their livings and being, he only gave the Law, who could only give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of Mankind; but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels, as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the Acts, He gave the Law by the Ordinance of Angels.

3. The Propriety and Peculiarity of the People receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and differed. Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the Promise they were, for the Promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed; not unto his seeds, as to Esau and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Nam, Gal. 3.16. to Abraham and his seed was the Promise made; he saith not, to the seeds, as speaking of many; but, to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by St. Augustine; that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses; the Law written in the Commandments received by Moses in the Worlds year, 2514, continued to the Baptism of John; from which time, began the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of our Justification; but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in Ceremonies, and a preparation to Passions of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World; and therefore St. Paul calleth the Rudiments of the Law, beggarly and weak; beggarly, as containing no Grace; weak, as not able to forgive and justify. The blood of Goats and Bulls, and the Ashes of an Heifer could only cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could Gal. 3. justify, then Christ died in vain.

SECT. XI.

Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

THE old and new Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by Works, the new by Grace; but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree; which is, mans happiness and salvation. The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesses of Gods Will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witness. Yet the New is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate, the ways of our Redemption. It also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith, The New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderful miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy pessible; but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a Testament and Gospel for ever enduring.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is of the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad-tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or Story of the Apostles, are plentiful Interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad-tidings in general, as in Ezra 52. n. 7, concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signify that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luke 2. 10, when also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ; and so we understand the four Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the Doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14, and 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Daniel comprised in these four.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the Effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and Will of God in substance of Doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant and Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old Law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ; the old promising him as to come, the new already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one and the same end, even the salvation of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the World among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by Death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For, I speak not of the poor and miserable Souls, whom hunger and extreme necessity intrencheth; but of those detested Thieves, who, to maintain themselves Lord-like, Assault, Rob, and Wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring-Men; or break by violence into other Mens Houses, and spend in Bravery, Drunkenness and upon Harlots, in one day, what other Men have sometime laboured for all their lives; impoverishing whole Families, and taking the Bread and Food from the Mouths of their Children. And that this Commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear; if Princes would resolve, but for a few years, to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-kindred. And if every Man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Commonwealth, but these Men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table is, the prohibition of false witness: from which Men could not forbear, all fury of state and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially, in matters criminal, that the Law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falshood to lay on his Brother.

The last of the ten Commandments, forbideth us to covet any thing, which belongs to another Man, either the bodies of their Wives for concupiscence, or their goods for the desire of gain. And this Precept seemeth the hardest for Men to observe; so effected by reason of our frail affections; and yet, if we judg here rightly, it may be doubted, whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies, and vain thoughts. For, although it be not ealie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for Grace. How the word Coveting, reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For, Concupiscentia, according to some, Est offensiva libentis appetitus: An unbridled, or unrestrained Appetite of having; And, as touching such an Appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our natural frailty, or unadvised errors. But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscentia is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the latter sort; which is, Altus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium altus boni et studij. Such passions, or inclinations, are imperfect Actus, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper Principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quamdiu resagamus, nihil nocet: nocet autem cum dominari permitimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some, that they hurt us not; and that when only they hurt, when we suffer them to bear sway. But these Men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth Precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it break not out into act, is forbidden; therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held; that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For, even so the Moral Philosopher can tell us, that the continent Man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right Reason) as, on the other side, the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, which they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act; and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the continent Man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are hence forbidden. For though he that bridled his evil desires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them; yet, such a Man according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous Man. For involuntarius makes Continencia, not to be vertue, but only a degree unto it; confiding, that though the Continent Man do well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent Man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a Virtuous Man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Only in this we excel him here; that we are able out of Divinity, to give the true reason of this Doctrine; which is, that every one smeth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the Continent Man that is, of him which bridled them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witness our love toward himself; we may not fately give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is Justice it self) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keep. For, as he is accused (saith St. Hieron.) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui dicit impossibilia Dum præcipisse. Accusæ est he that saith, that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weakness also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no Man just, David witnesseth: Enter into Judgment with thy Servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the fruit of Kings, There is no Man that sinneth not; Ps. 145. 2. 46. And again, Who can say, I have made my Heart clean? But, seeing there is no sin grievous without deliberation; let every Mans Conscience judg him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can, yea, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the subject, neglecting the same, seek to satisfy his Savage with fitting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be derided therein.

SECT.

SECT. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

And if we consider advisedly, and soberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his People, it will appear, that such was his merciful Providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain nor profit adjoined to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no Divine Power at all, nor any Religion among Men; yet, if we did not for our own fakes strive to observe these Laws, all Society of Men, and all endeavours, all happiness and contentment in this life would be taken away, and every State and Commonwealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore the Laws were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every Man might enjoy the Fruits of his own travail, that Right might be done to all Men, from all Men: that by Justice, Order, and Peace, we might live the lives of reasonable Men, and not of Beasts; of Free-men, and not of Slaves; of Civil Men, and not of Salvages. And hence making our humane Reason only Judg, let us see the inconveniences in this life, which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Laws.

As first, what would the issue be, if we acknowledged many Gods? would not arise greater Hatred, War, and Blood-shed, than that which the difference of Ceremony, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit Mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loss of time, and an impossibility to receive thencefrom, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to Man, that whosoever taketh the Name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his Holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath Holy, giveth rest to Men and Beasts, and Nature her self requireth intermission from labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our Children to scorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If Murder be not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished; and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If Adultery were lawful, and permitted, no Man could stay unto himself. This is my Son: there would be no Inheritance proper, no Honour descend to Posterity, no endeavour by vertue and undertaking to raise Families; Murders and Poisonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed; and every Man subject to much filth and unclean Disasters.

If Stealch and violent Rapine were suffered, all Mankind would shortly after perill, or live as the Salvages, by Roots and Acorns. For no Man laboureth but to enjoy the Fruits thereof.

And such is the mischief of Robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed Restitution four-fold, Policy of State, and Necessity, hath made it death.

To permit false Witness, is to take all Mens lives and estates from them by corruptions the Wicked would swear against the Vertuous; the Walter against the Wealthy; the idle Begger and Lye-teller, against the careful and painful Labourer: all trial of Right were taken away, and Justice thereby banished out of the World.

The coveting of that which belongs to other Men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of Mind, with an inward vexation; for while we cover what appertaineth to others, we neglect our own appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitless hopes, so long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives, or Goods of our Neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of God's Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most merciful and provident God ordain them: without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the Earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remain but in the state of brute Beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

SECT. XV.

Of humane Law, written, and unwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two, (viz.) Written, and unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time; which Idore calls Mores; and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vestitæ probatæ; to be Customs approved by Antiquity, or unwritten Laws. Now Custom differeth from Life, as the cause from the effect; in that Custom is by use and continuance established into a Law; but yet there, where the Law is defective, faith Ulpian.

And of Customs there are two general natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written Customs, received, and exercised by Nations, as the Customs of Burgundy and Normandy, the ancient general Custom of England, and the Customs of Castile, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty Customs, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National Customs are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty Customs are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the Inhabitants. The Custom of the Duchy of Cornwall, comprehending also the Statutes of Devon, as touching Tines, and Tine Causes are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever, use and time hath made these Customs Laws, yet ought every Custom to be rational, as well as prescribed. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) quod ab initio viciatum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all Laws of Custom: the one, that it be not repugnant to the Law Divine, and Natural: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest that every Custom which is against the Law, had its beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature, were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they have been since continued: because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this fort over-ruled in the Law: Per populum Constituta non contra Legem induci non possunt, nisi de voluntate illius qui vocatur Legem: et cum Constitutionem sit auctor potest, quæ sit Princeps populi. The People cannot bring in a new Law and Ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane Law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practical Reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papius calls the Law a common Precept, the advisement of wise Men, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Ubi dicitur the Law, a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fit for government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod natione conficitur: Alii that stands with reason.

c. 2. l. 1. c. 2.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined, Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural and eternal, made by the rational discourse of those that exercise public Authority: prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying, Mibi Lex esse non videtur, que iusta non sit: ita sicut non est Lex ad omnes, quæ non est iusta: and just it cannot be, except it agree with the Law natural and eternal. For there is no Law just and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil iustum aut Legitimum est, quod non ab æterna Legge sibi homines derivaverunt.

Lib. 1. de
iur. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of Reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law natural, to wit, the natural, demonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the Law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracy, it cannot be doubted, be the Government of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the title of those Decrees called Violentæ, or inique Constitutiones: Violence, or wicked Constitutions.

4. Part.

Of humane Law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawn out of the Law of Nature: to every particular of the humane Law may be referred into some principle or rule of the natural.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by public Authority, it prescribeth and directeth all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, Alia Lex Julia de Adulterio, alia Cornelia de Sacerdotibus. The Law of Julian against Adultery, is one: the Cornelian against Sacerdotes is another. Now the humane Law generally taken, is in respect of these considerations divided into the Law of Nations, and the Civil.

The Law of Nations is taken less or more properly: it is properly for every Law which is not of it self, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it cometh that Ulpian understands it: to be that which Jus Gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst Men, as Religion, and the Worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations: but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet to probable, that all Nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted between enemies, &c. Which National Law, according to divers acceptations and divers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Natural, sometime of the Humane.

Jus Civile, or the Civil Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers Estates it is all divers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately derived from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For, it is partly deduced out of such principles, as all Nations do not agree unto, or easily assent unto: because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and do not fit all Estates. Hereof Ulpian, Jus Civile neque in totum à Naturæ & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia est servit: itaque cum aliquo de se addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jure proprium, Jus Civile efficitur: The Civil Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we add unto, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Civil Law.

In l. 6.

The Law now commonly called the Civil Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decemviri, 303 years after the Foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the ancient Roman Customs and Laws Regal. The Regal Laws were devised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papiæ, because they were gathered by Papius, Trajan when reigning. For, though for many of the former Laws as maintained Kingly Authority, were abolished with the name: yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common Utility, were continued, and were a part of the Laws of the twelve Tables. To these Laws of the twelve Tables, were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus consulta: those of the common People, called Plebis-scita, those of the Lawyeis, called Jurisperitorum, and the Edicts of the Annual Magistratus, which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperor, they were by him confirmed, and made perpetual Laws, and the Volume styled, Edictum perpetuum: as those and the like collections of Justinian afterward were.

Dicitur.

C. Sign.

mina.

The difference antiently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Règlemens, consisted in this, that Laws are the Constitutions made or confirmed by Sovereign Authority (be the Sovereignty in the People, in a few, or in one) and are withal general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Justinian Magistrate, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer who made the same, faith Papir, Qui plurimum Edicto tribuitur, Legem annuam esse dicunt. They who ascribe the most to an Edict, say that it is a Law for one year: Though Ulpian doth also express by the word Constitutiones or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acti of Prærogatives: as, Constitutiones and Edictum of quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit: An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperor doth ordain, or proclaim.

Lastly, the humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiastical, or Canon. The Secu- lar commanding temporal good, to wit, the Peace and Tranquillity of the Common-wealth: the Ecclesiastical, the spiritual good, and right government of the Ecclesiastical Common-wealth, or Church: Illud natura legem, hoc divinum spectat: That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may Jus Civile be taken two ways: First, as distinguishing from the Law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and diverse from the Ecclesiastical. But this division of the School-men is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Civil is a Law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other Laws not Ecclesiastical. Law, of Secul Laws in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-wealths, there are three kinds: the Civil, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerful: the Laws of England, called Common, and the Laws of Custom, or Provincial. In Spain, besides the Law Civil, they have the Customs of Castile, and other Provinces. In France, besides the Civil, the Customs of Burgundy, Blaye, Borris, Nivernois, and Lodovici, &c. Tons les lieux finies & assis on Lodovici, seigneur gouverneur selon les Coutumes du dit pays: All places lying within the precinct of Lodovici, shall be governed according to the Customs of that place. There are also in France the Customs of Normandy, and these of two kinds, General, and Local: and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charter of confirmation of these ancient Customs, becometh and since their reformation have these words: Nos autem Regitrum prædictum, usque laudabiles, & Constituentes antiquæ, &c. Laudamus, approbamus, & autoritate Regia confirmamus: The Register approve, laudable use, and ancient customs, we praise, approve, and by our Kingly Authority confirm. The Common-Law of England is also compounded of the ancient Customs of the same, and of certain Maxims by those Customs of the Realm approved. Upon which Customs also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, King Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

Act. 3.
c. 1. cap.

These ancient Customs of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from Age to Age: as that Custom by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, diffided, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient Custom of England, that the eldest Sons should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland, it is the Custom of all Lands (that have not been resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his own life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many Brothers) before the Heir in lineal descent, this is called the Custom of Tenacity. For example, if a Lord of Land have four Sons, and the eldest of those four have also a Son, the three Brothers of the eldest Son, after the death of their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-child: the Custom being grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, having always lived in a sub-divided Civil War, nor only the greatest against the greatest, but every Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforced to leave Successors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now, as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, the great and general Custom of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof, but the greatest bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acti of Par- liament: Laws propounded and approved by the three Estates of the Realm, and commended by the King, to the obedience of which, all men are thereto fore bound, because they are Acti of choice, and legislative. Leges nulli sunt casus non tenent, quæ non subditi, because they are received by the judgment of the Subjects. Tum domini humane Leges habent vim, cum ferunt non modo instituta, sed etiam ferunt de approbatione Communitatis: It is then that humane Laws have their strength, when they shall not only be devised, but by the approbation of the People confirmed.

Ulpian saith these properties to every Christian Law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custom of the Country: also for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifest: and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He also gives four effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehendeth in two: to wit, obligation, and mitigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice: the latter encourages with hopes, to follow Vertue. For, according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum: It becometh the Law to be a model of Vertue, and a commander of Vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the observation of things commanded, or forbidden, is an effect common to all Laws: and it is two-fold: the one constraineth us by fear of our consciences, the other by fear of external punishment. These two effects the Law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Cædive and Dirigive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Ligative, or incouragement to Vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the Law, to make men virtuous. For Laws being such as they ought to be, do both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing: laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the Law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum, Decline thou from evil, and do good.

SECT. XVI.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what sort.

NOW, whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Drines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Sovereign Princes be compellable, yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforesaid: the one Dirigive, the other Cædive: to the power Dirigive they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For, as touching violence, or punishments, no man is bound to give a prejudicial judgment against himself: and, it is usual have not any power over each other, much less have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of Laws, simply then is the Prince so much above the Laws, as the Soul and Body united, is above a dead and senseless Carcase. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum, & Lex animata: An animate, and living Law. But this

D. 4. 1. 2.
 this is true, that by giving authority to Laws, Princes both add greatness to themselves, and conferre it and therefore was it said of Brutus out of Jugurthin's Mouth dedit Regibus legi and Lex auctoritas est: nam Lex facit in seipso Rex, Rightfully enge the King to attribute that to the Law, which the Law first attributed to the King, For it is the Law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Brutius attributeth this power to the humane Law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and Laws divine; and by humane Laws only declared to be Kings. As for the places mentioned by the Prætor and Lætor, which inter a kind of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of confidence, and profit arising from the examples of various Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God onely.

[illegible]

Now, to forming the Political Laws, given by Above the Nation of the Isaacites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civil Infringements other People should preface to dignities, I will not presume to determine; but leave it as a question for them men to decide, whose provisions give their greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to say, that they ought not to fixen wider than God's hand, who hath made them, and who has no Laws for Nations, or their wisest pleads for Liberty, and for their Rights, to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their several qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borders, no less than in their peculiar Languages, which different conditions to govern aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman Civil Law did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience; but when it was extended, and lived and become familiar, it was not the admittance of a new Law in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural Customs of the thirty people which it governed. For whether it be through a long continuing possession (as Atholores were willingly granted; some in

To this effect it was observed by Mr. Docter Widd, that the moral Judicalls of Mofes do partly bind, and partly k free. They do not bind affirmatively, that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is given by Mofes; Christian Magistrates ruling under Chrift the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Mofes Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burthen more heavy: for to the more mercour than Mofes, becometh not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversy among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath always been very plausible. And surely, howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and only Law; yet still we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equal satisfaction in striking interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judges could have been witnesses, if when Forense, that notable Bulwark of our Laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgment given against a Gentl^{woman} at Salisbury; who was accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murthering her Husband, was thereupon condemnned, and burnt to ashes: the man who secured her, within a year after, being convicted for the same offence, confessed that his Midwife was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though everlastingly) grievously lamented; and thus Judge Giffard the same Author, Sapientia ipsi multo affinis est, quæ nunquam in citis sita animorum effusio de hoc facto ipsi peragitur: He himself often confessed unto me, that he should ever, during his life, be able to clear his conscience of that fact. Wherefore, that acknowledgment which other Sapientia vult unto the Midwife, that she should have drawn her offspring out, before the price of Science, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other publick Institutions, to that of Meber: and so much the CHAPTER V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moses.

S E C T. I.

Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse; with a note of the reverence given to the Worship of God, in this ordering of their Troops.

When Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the People, and finished the Tabernacle of the Ark, and Sanctuary; he mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel; and having seen what number of Men, fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe: from twenty years of age and upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603,550 able men for the Wars, besides Women and Children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four good and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The fait of these containing 186,400 able Men consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their number, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600 fighting men, led by Natanson in Issachar, 54400 led by Nathaniel, in Zabulon 57400 led by Eliab. A third marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vant-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general encamping on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures, the host of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simson and Gad, in number, 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe Reuben were 46500 under Elizur; in Simson, 59300 under Shelumiel; Gad, 45650 under Elisaphah. These had the second place, and encamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joyned the Regiment of Manasseh and Benjamin; who joyned together, made in number, 108100 able men. These marched in the third place, encamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500 under Elifaz; Manasse 32200 under Gamilie; Benjamin 35400 under Abid.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600 able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joined the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asher. And these had the Rerc-ward, and moved last, encamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700 under Abiezars, Asher 41500 under Paezil; Nephthali 53400 under Abiezars.

41500 under Agass, Nephtali 53400 under Abraham, Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens: as it may appear by the many and infurrection against Misero Numb. 16, verf. 1, and 2. For there arose up against Misero 250 Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown: of which numbers were Korah, Dathan and Abiram. Which three principal Mutineers, with those 250 Captains that followed them, were not any of the Princes of the Tribes or general Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Numb. 1, is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children took place not only in the division of the Land of Yirméah, and other things of more consequence, known after following; but even in fortifying them under the several Standards in the Wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedence, and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Leah, Joseph's Wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simon, who had under-gone his Father's curse; and with Gad, the Son of his Mothers Handmaid. Issachar, who, in temporal things, had the pre-eminence; the first-born, double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments; the younger (according to Joseph's Prophecy) taking place before the elder, by was assisted by

by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacob's Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacob's prophecy. He had with him under his Standard, none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of these four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, (surrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the Heathen and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful Armies which guarded the fume: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moveable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000 persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof. c. 85. and 86. had the peculiar charge, according to their several Offices and Functions: the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the People divided the former order in the encampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves. The first of them square, on every side of the Tabernacle; the Gad on the West, within the Army, and the Standard of Ephraim, over whom Elisaph commanded, in number 7500. The Army of Kohath on the South-side, guided by Elisaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8000. The third Company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zuril commanded, in number 6200, and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan. On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah bore, did Misael and Aron lodge, and their children, who were the fifth and immediate Commanders, both of Centuries, and of the People: under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical Families, was Eleazar, the son of Aron, his successor in the high Priesthood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their encamping and marching : the Tabernacle being always left in the middle of the front thereof. The reverend care which Moses the Prophet and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged to the outward and leaf parts of the Tabernacle, Ark, and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal born towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every and the least part thereof ; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed ; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions, the dutiful observance in the laying up, and preserving the holy Vessels ; the solemn removing thereof ; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and easily seen in this super-late Age, by those of the Famly, by the Academy, Bonny, and other Servitors, as all that was once bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of Togery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous display of vanity ; so much that would soon bring to puffs (if it were not rebuked) that God would be turned out of the Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields and Mountains, and under the Hedges, and the Offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) to be as contemptible as those places ; all Order, Discipline, and Church-government, left to newwinds of Opinion, and men's fancies ; yea, and soon after, as many kinds of Religions would spring up, as there are Parliaments within England ; every contentious and ignorant party clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inasmuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no less various than contrary to it felt, the Faith of men will soon for aye decay by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which diffraction gave a great Price of many caule, of this Answer to those that perfwaded him to become a Lutheran: Si me adjuvatores, tunc condonabo et alius: Si me alius adjuvat, a vobis condonabor: quid fignifico vobis, sed quid sequar, non habeo: I f I adjuvay my self to you, I am condoned by others: I f I joyne with others, I am condoned by you: what I should avoid I see, but I see not what I should follow.

SECT. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes : the Passover of the second year : the departing of Iethro.

NOW, when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the Laws, numbers, and Army, and divided them into the Barrels and Trunks before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all the forts; the twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes, brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, their transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged therunto, the Sanctuary excepted, which for reverence was carried uppon the shoulders of the Sons of Korah, to whom the Levites was committed; and the Chariots, in which was contained the other parts of the Tabernacle and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely, to the sons of Gerson and Mozah.

Besides the Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charge of fine Silver, weighing 130 shekels; a silver Bowl of 70 shekels, after the hkeel of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of Gold, of ten shekels, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aron; and before they marched forth, Moshe Sinai towards their conquest, belides the Beasts of Burden offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Commanded; and two hundred and twelve silver Chargers, and two hundred silver Bowls, amounting unto 2400 shekels of silver; and two hundred and twelve Incense-Cups, to 120 shekels of gold; the weight of gold makes of shekels of silver 1200, each shekel of gold valuing ten of silver; so that the whole value of silver and silver vessels which they offered at this time, was about four hundred and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moshe, as in all the rest, by the Spirit of God considered, gave order for the celebrating of the Paf- son of the second Month, which was performed on the fourteenth day of the twelfth day of the second Year; and on up from above the Tabernacle, as a Cloud was lifted forward; Moshe beginning his march with this invocation to God: Refr up, Lord, and let thy face be feattered; and let thou that hast thee, be before thy people. Then all the people of Israel removed from their encamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Army, or great squadron of Juda-

the common, and the Sanctuary Siehl were all one, Numb. 9. 5. Numb. 10. 11. Exod. ult. 34. Numb. 9. 17.

led by Nafeth, taking the Vant-guard, followed Nathaniel and Eliah, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon; after whom the rest marched, as in the Figure express'd. And because the passage through to many Defarts and Mountains, was exceeding difficult: Mofes leaving nothing un-forethought, which might serve for the advancement of his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father-in-Law, whom, in the tenth of Numbers, he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great understanding and judgement (as appeared by the counsel he gave to Mofes for the appointing of Judges over the People) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himself inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great years and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Midian, when Mofes fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42 years before this request made. And though Mofes himself had lived 40 years in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travel; yet the better to assure his passage, and to great a multitude of souls, which could not be fed as a Million, it was necessary to use many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Mofes, it is answered in these places, Deu. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Yitum, otherwise Yethum, Hobab, yielded his not; for it is evident, that he went back to Midian, into his own Country. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the Prosperity of this Hobab was mingled with the Issachar, it is most likely that this his return to his own Country, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his own Country, by fitting things in order, than to abide there.

SECT. III.

The Voyage from Horeb to Kades; the Mutinies by the way; and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.

After the diffinitive of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the deserts of Paran, and after three days wandering, they came down at the Sinai of lust, afterward called Tabera, or Incensaries; by reason that God consumed with fire those Meneers and Murmurers, which rose up in this remove, which happened about the 23 day of the fame Moneth. And from this 23 day of the second Moneth of the second year, they rested, and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to call up) three days, the 24 day of the third Moneth; & so to wit, all the Moneth of Sin, and the first whereof surviving, they died certain numbers: from whence in the following Moneth, called Thamus, an answering to our July, they went on to Hazereth, where Miriam the sister of Moser was stricken with the Leprosy, which continued upon her seven days, after whose recovery Israel removed toward the border of Edomes, and encamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, whence Moses sent the twelve Discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themselves of the fertility and strength of the country; as also to take knowledge of the Ways, Passes, Rivers, Fords and Mountains. For Ara, King of the Canaanites, surprized divers companies of the Israelites; by lying in ambush near those ways, through which

Of their unwillingness to return; with the punishment thereof; and of divers accidents in the return.

Now, when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the People, and made them know his heavy displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though over late; the times of Grace and mends Repentance having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, they had so often paid and dallied with his merciful sufficings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land, contrary again to the advice of Moses; who assured them that God was not among them; and that the Ark of his Covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not err; and that the Enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended, and rebated, was now left no less sharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no less cruel. But as men from whom God hath with-drawn his Grace, do always follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews, after they had forsaken the opportunity by their Conductors offered; and might then have entered Judea before their Enemies were prepared and joined; did afterward, contrary to Gods Commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ran head-long, and without advice, into the Mountains of Idumea. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joined, and attending their advantage, let on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Horeb: the Amalekites, in revenge of their former Joys and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites, to prevent their displacement and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings, joined together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painful passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly travelled, in which they found the banks of the Red Sea again; in which recess, before they came back to pass over Jordan, there were consumed eight and thirty years; and the whole number of the 600 and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Israhel, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and careless generation were wholly worn out, and the promised Land belov'd on their children; which were increased to 600000 and more. For, besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of their Discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Molech, and the Hosts of Heaven. For, although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Now, after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cader, Moses, according to the Commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoars of the Red Sea. And so from Cader, or Rithma, he removed to Reammunpara, to call of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he crossed the Valley, and fate down at Ressa, near the foot of the Mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and encamped at Ceclata; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was flogged to death. After which, Moses always keeping the Valley, between two great ledges of Mountains (which bound the Defart of Sin, and those of Pharan) cross'd the fame from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the Mountain of Sapher, or Sepher; this making the twentieth Manfion. From thence he passed on to Hirada; and then to Maclaboth; and then to Tharab, and so to Tharab or Thare; the four and twentieth Manfion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who, for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered Incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700 of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgments of God that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his Government; or before. For among so great a multitude, those laymen, who would have usurped Ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and Goods; even while they fought to over-throw the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrats, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Commonwealth of his People. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the 12 Rods given by the Heads of the 12 Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which, being all withered and dried Wands, and only Rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron's son that of Levi, it pleased God, that the Rod of Aaron received, by his power, a vegetable spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark, one night, had on it both Buds, Blossoms, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab, the whole Army removed to Meibora; and thence to Efmona; and thence to Mosferoth (or Mesurith, after S. Jerom) and from Mosferoth to Benjacan; and so to Gadgad, which Jerom calleth Gadida; thence to Setabata, the thirtieth Manfion; where, from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adriamim maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian, and Afiongaber.

Now, although it be very probable, that at Afiongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleet for the Egyptians, there was loss of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the Stony, which he calleth Coryr, from whence (saith he) the Inhabitants convey water in Pipes of Leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyses; yet is Adriamim greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Setabata, being the ninth and twentieth, or thirtieth Manfion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also call'd Setabata, or Tubab, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Afiongaber, or Elath, I cannot believe, for the way thither is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh Water in those sandy parts of Arabia; which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty land, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Setabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and encamped at Horebna, and from thence to Efiongaber; which City in Tophan time, had the name of Berenice; and in Hierom, Efisa. From thence, keeping the Sea and Elath on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded; Efiongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Efiongaber, or Afiongaber, Elath and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Horeb, near the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Horeb was at this time in the South border of Idumea. And if Efiongaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this present been subject unto the Idumeans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places; for it is said; And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took Men with them; which were those Companies that followed young Adad of Idumea into Egypt, when he fled from Jush. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a Navie of Ships in Efiongaber, besides Elath, in the Land of Edom.

Of Moses arrival at Zin Cades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Efiongaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh; or in Berob, of the Children of Jacan; where the fire down in the first Month of the fortieth Year, after they left Egypt. For, at the next Manfion, Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fortieth Year; the nine and thirtieth Year taking end at Efiongaber. And at this City of Cader (for it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, Mary, Moses Sister, whose Sepulchre was to be seen in S. Hierom's time, as himself avoweth. From hence, ere they departed to the Mountain Horeb, all the People murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of Water. For neither the punishments by Fire from Heaven; nor being devoured and swallowed up by the Earth by the sudden Pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites; but in stead of feeding, for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and calling ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yet, though they well knew that their own Fathers had left their Bodies in the Deserts, and they were now entered into the fortieth Year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in fight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times; and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoining, with his Rod, and the Waters issued out in great abundance, with which both themselves and their Cattel were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to send the travels of Aaron at the Mountain Horeb, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain Horeb, Aaron was depouled of the garments of his Priesthood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God hath commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this Mountain call'd Horeb, otherwise Mosera, as in Dout. 10. vers. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the even and twentieth Manfion; and Mosera, which they write Mosera, for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Manfion, and is also call'd Horeb, to be two distinct places; because Mosera in passing from Cader towards Efiongaber, encamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hefmona, and before he came to Benjacan. And this Mosera, which is also call'd Horeb, came unto after he had left Cader, where Miriam, Moses Sister, died; the first being the even and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Manfion. But for Horeb, which is also call'd Mosera, it should have been written, Horeb justa Mosera, Horeb near Mosera; for it is but one Root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are; Whereof the West part Mosera calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Mosera encamped, as he pass'd towards the Red Sea on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again Northwards towards Moab, as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Now it was from Cader before they came to Horeb, because Horeb belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that he might pass with the People of Israell through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Aaron and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now, the better to persuade the Prince of Idumea hereunto, Moses remembered him, that he was of the same Race and Family with Israell; calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one Father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to afflict the Canaanites; against whom, Esau his Ancestor had made War, and driven out of the Horites (who were of their ancient Races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name, Edom, or Idumea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes; and promises assured Edom, or the

the King thereof that he would no way offend his People, or walt his Country, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high-ways, paying Money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the Water which themselves or their Cattel should drink. For Mofes was commanded by God, not to provoke the Children of Eſau. But the King of Idumea knowing the strength of his own Country, the fame being near Canaan, ramp'd with high and ſharp Mountains and withal ſuſpecting, as a natural wife Man that ſooooo ſtrangers being once enter'd his Country, it would reſiſt in their wills to give him Law, reſolutely reſuſed them paſſage, and delivered this answer to the Meſſengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and reſuſt them by all poſſible means. And not knowing whether ſuch a denial might ſatiſſie or exasperate, he gathered the ſtrength of his Country together, and ſhewed himſelf prepared to defend their paſſage. For, as it is written, Then Edome came out againſt him (to wit, Mofes) with much People, and with a mighty Power. Whereupon Mofes underſtanding, that the end of his enterpriſe was not the conqueſt of Seir, or Idumea, and that the Land promiſed, was that of Canaan: like unto himſelf, who was of natural underſtanding the greateſt of any Man, and the ſkilfulleſt Man of War that the World had, he reſuſed to adventure the Army of Iſrael againſt a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a paſſage to invade otherſ and which, by reaſon of the fear of their mountainous Country, could not but have endangered, or (at leaſt) greatly enfeebled the ſtrength of Iſrael, and rendered them leſſe able, if not altogether powerleſs, to have conqerred the reſt.

SECT. VI.

Of their compaſſing Idumea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumea, turned himſelf towards the Eaſt, and marched towards the Deſarts of Moab. Which, when Arad the King of the Canaanites underſtood, and that Mofes had blanch'd the way of Idumea: and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Iſrael aimed at, he thought it ſafeſt, rather to find his Enemies in his Neighbours Country, than to be found by them in his own; which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Mofes been enforced hith to have made his way by the Sword through Idumea, and thereby though victorious, greatly have leſſen'd his numbers. But although it kill out otherwiſe than Arad hoped for, yet, being reſolv'd to make trial, what courage the Iſraelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home: leading the ſtrength of his Nation to the edge of the Deſart, he let up ſome part of the Army: which, for the multitude occupied a great ſpace, and for the many herds of Cattel that they drove with them, could not encamp ſo near together, but that ſome quarter or other was overſhadow'd by ſunſhine. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he ſlew ſome few of the Iſraelites, and carried with him many Priſoners.

Now, it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predeceſſor, which joynd his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to thoſe mutinous Iſraelites, which, without direction from God by Mofes, would have enter'd Canaan from Cadeſhbarne. For it ſeemeth, that the greateſt number of that Army were of the Canaanites, becauſe in the hint of Deuteronomy 44 the Amorites are nam'd alone without the Amalekites, and are ſaid to have beaten the Iſraelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the fame that had a victory over Iſrael near Cadeſhbarne, or, if it were his Predeceſſor that then prevail'd: this Man finding that Mofes was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was ſtill to be invaded, and in danger of being conqerred, not knowing of Mofes purpoſe to paſs Moab, determin'd, while he was yet in the Deſart, to try the power of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers: that the Iſraelites utterly deſtroyed the Canaanites, and their Cities, they are much miſtaken that think, that this deſtruction was preſently performed by the Iſraelites. But it is to be underſtood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joſias. For, had Mofes at this time enter'd Canaan in the purſuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Deſarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetch'd a wearſome and needleſs compaſs, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it ſelf, but that his Territory lay without it, and near to the Mountain Haz. For, Haz and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for ſo far the Iſraelites, after their victory purſued the Canaanites) is ſeated in the South of Judea. There is alſo a City of that name in Simon. But there is no ſuch place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed preſently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the fame was obtained in the future, and in Joſias his time, and not at the infant of Arads affairs. For, had the Iſraelites at this time ſack'd the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complain'd for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is alſo Water and Bread. But it was in the time of Joſias, that the Iſraelites took their revenge, and after they had paſſed Jordan: Joſias then governing them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verſe nameth this Arad by the name of his City ſo called, and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Iſraelites purſued the Canaanite. And he nam'd them amongſt thoſe Kings, which he vanquiſhed, and put to death.

Now, after this affaile and ſurprize by Arad, Mofes hiding that all entrance on that ſide was deſcended, he led the People Eaſtward to compaſs Idumea, and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites. But the Iſraelites, to whom the very name of a Deſart was terrible, began again to rebel againſt their Leader: till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whoſe Venom inflamed them, and burnt them as Fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them again by their beſeeching an artificial Serpent, by his Commandment ſet up.

From the Mount Haz, Mofes leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea and Cadeſhbarne, encamp'd at Zalmouſ: and thence he removed to Paran, where he erect'd the Brazen Serpent: making threſe journeys by the edge of Idumea, but without it.

SECT. VII.

Of the Book of the Battels of the Lord, mention'd in this Story, and of other Books mention'd in Scripture, which are loſt.

NOW, concerning the War between Iſrael and Sehon, Mofes ſeemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book, entituled, Liber Balaam Domini: The Book of Gods Battels: and therefore paſſeth over many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words, after the Geneſis Tranſlation, are theſe: Wherefore ſhall be ſpoken in the Book of the Battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in ſenſe from this: But the Greek Syntagma vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect: For thus it is ſaid in the Book, The War of the Lord hath burn'd (or inflam'd) Zoar, and the Brook of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which in the Geneſian and Vulgar Edition, nam'd the Region of Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the Eaſt, as he conjectureth. The Text, he readeth thus. Idired dei ſales in rorſione bellorum Jehoveh, canta Vahabim in Kogtone Suph & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis: *Therefore it is ſpoken in repeating of the Battels of Jehovah, againſt Vahabim the Country of Suph, and againſt the Rivers, the River of Ar-non, in which words he underſtands, that amongſt the Wars which the Lord diſpos'd for the good of the Iſraelites, there was in thoſe times a famous memory in the mouth of moſt Men, concerning the War of Sehon againſt Vahab, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the poſſeſſion of the Moabites. For this Vahab was the immediate Predeceſſor of Balaam, who lived with Mofes:
ſo though it be written that this Balaam was the Son of Zippor, and not of Vahab. For, it ſeems (as it is plain in the ſucceſſion of the Edomites) that theſe Kingdoms were elective, and not ſucceſſive. And as Junius in this Tranſlation underſtandeth no ſpecial Book of the Battels of the Lord: ſo others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any ſpecial Book be meant: and if any, whether it be not a prediction of Wars in future ages, to be waged in theſe places, and to be written in the Book of Judger. Syracides cap. 46. tells us plainly, that theſe Battels of the Lord were fought by Joſias: Who was there (ſaith he) before him like to him? for he fought the Battels of the Lord. But ſeeing the Hiſtories of the Scripture elſewhere often paſs over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Books written of the ſame matter at large: therefore it ſeemeth probable, that ſuch a Book as this there was: wherein the ſeveral victories by Iſrael obtain'd, and alſo victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Iſraelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the ſame ſhould now be wanting, is not ſtrange, ſeeing to many other Volumes, fill'd with divine diſcourſe, have perished in the long race of time, or have been deſtroy'd by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magiſtrates. For the Books of Heneb, howſoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now ſuſ-pected, are remembred in an Epistle of Theodore, and cited by Origen, αὐτὸς ἀπὸ τοῦ, and by Tertullian.*

That work alſo of the Patriarch Abraham, of For-nation, which others beſtow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembred by Z 2 Joſias.

it. For Phanon was ſometime a principal City of the Edomites. Now, where it is written in Numb. 21. 4.
That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which griev'd the People, it was not thereby meant, that the Iſraelites turned back towards the Red Sea:
neither did they march (according to Fanſius) per viam que habet à latere mare rubrum, by the way that ſided the Red Sea: but indeed they croſs'd it, and went athwart the common way from Galaz, Traconitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Eſſangaber, Eloth, and Midian; which way, as it lay North and South, ſo Iſrael to ſhun the border of Edom, and to take the utmoſt Eaſt part of Moab, croſs'd the common way towards the Eaſt, and then they enter'd again towards the North, as before.

From Phanon he went to Oboth, where he enter'd the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Suph, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Arnon, the eight and thirtieth Manſion, that is, where the Mountains ſo called take beginning, and are as yet but ſmall Mountures of Hills, on the Eaſt border of Moab: from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riſeth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having paſſ'd that River, they lodg'd at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab: which Jeremy the Prophet, Chap.
48. Verſ. 22. calleth the Hamſe of Diblahaim, the fame which afterward was deſtroyed among the reſt by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River Arnon, and encamp'd in the Mountains of Abarim; though in the 22 of Numbers, Mofes doth not remember Helmondiblahaim, but ſpeaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other ſide of Arnon: calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: ſpeaking as he found the ſtate of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not antiently the border of Moab, but was lately conqerred from the Moabites, by Sehon King of the Amorites, even from the Predeceſſor of Balaam
For then reigning. From Diblahaim, Mofes ſent meſſengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to deſire a paſſage through his Country: which, though he knew would be deny'd him, yet he deſir'd to give a reaſon to the neighbour Nations of the War he undertook. And though Edom had reſuſed him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him.
Mofes alſo in ſending meſſengers to Sehon, obſerv'd the ſame precept which he left to his Politiyrany Successors, for a Law of the War; namely, in Deut.
20. 10. in theſe words: *When thou comſt near

Jofhua, Chap. 10. Verf. 13. and in the fecond of Samuel, Chap. 1. Verf. 18. called the Book of Jofhua, or Jofhuam, is alfo loft; wherein the ftay of the Sun and Moon in the middle of the Heavens is recorded, and how they flood till till Ifraël had avenged themfelves of their enemies; & out of which David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Juda to exercife their Bows againft their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predication, in which the Juft are written, according unto the fixty and ninth Psalm, Verf. 28. where it is faid; Let them be put out of the book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Jofua thinks that David by this Book, understood thofe of Samuel's Rabbi Salomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the juft Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Mofes are written. Others, that this was the Book of Exodus. Others, as Theodoret, that it was a Commentary upon Jofhua, by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chonizai, concerning Mansfob, remembered in the fecond of Chron. Chap. 33. v. 18, and 19th. Of this Book, alfo loft, Jofua conceives, that the Prophet Ezra wrote the Author.

The fame mifchance came alfo to the Story of Solomon, written by Abia Silanico, who met with Jerobam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Ifraël from the Son of Solomon. As to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to thofe of Jeda the Seer, remembered in the fecond of Chron. Chap. 9. Verf. 29. With thefe have the Books of She-maiah and of Ido, remembered in the fecond of Chron. Chap. 12. Verf. 15. perished; and that of John the Son of Henai, of the acts of Jofephaph, cited in the fecond of Chron. Chap. 20. Verf. 34. Alfo that Book of Solomon, which the Hebrews write Hifirion, of 5000 Verfes, of which, that part called Canticum Canticum, only remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this, divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the reft remembered by Origen, Jofephus, Jovian, Codexen, Cicero Africanus, Petrus Mirandula, and others.

Of thefe, and other Books many were confumed with the fame fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezar burnt the Temple of Jerufalem. But let us return thither where we left.

SECT. VIII.

Of Mofes his fparing the ifue of Lot; and of the Giants in thofe parts; and of Schon and Og.

WHEN Mofes had paffed Arnon, he incamped on the other fide thereof at Abirim, oppofite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Medin on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Ma-abiter on that fide. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-fide of Arnon, having loft all his ancient and belt Territory, which was now in the poffeffion of Schon the Amorite. For Mofes was commanded by God not to moleft Moab, neither to provoke them to battle, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the fame which was anciently poffeffed by the Emims, who were men of great ftature, and comparable to thofe Giants called Anaks, or the fonf of Anak.

God alfo commanded Mofes to fpare the Amorites, becaufe they likewife were defended of Lot: who had expelled from thence thofe Giants, which the Amorites called Zuzammims. For it feemeth that all that part, efpecially to the East of Jordan, even to the Defart of Arabia, as well on the Welt, as on the East-fide of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promifed, the Ifraelites did not at any time paff thofe Mountains to the East of Basan, but left their Country to them, as in the defcription following is made manifef. We find alfo, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: fo thefe Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it fell, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anaks dwelt in Hebron, which fometimes was called the City of Arabi, which Arabi in Jofhua is called the father of Jef. 16. v. the Anaks; and the greateft man of the Anaks. 13:14, 15.

There had alfo been Giants in the Land of the Ma-abites, called Emims: and their chief City was Averor Ar-nean the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Re-phaim, the Amorites gave the name of Zuzammims, which were of the fame ancient Canaanite: and their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were alfo called Zuzams, which is as much to fay, as Vicious, horrid, barbarous Gigantes: Strong men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Hani, or Hani, in the fame Province, and not far to the North of Arar.

Now Mofes having paff Arnon, and being incamped at Abirim; and having (as before) fent to Schon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a paffage through his Country, was denied it. For Schon being made proud by his former conquest upon Vab the Maabite: which Nation the Amorites efteemed but as Strangers and Ufurpers, (themyfelves being of the fons of Canaan, and the Maabites of Lot) refufed to grant Ifraël any entrance that way; and withall, prepared to encounter Mofes with as much force as he could, becaufe Mofes incamped in the Country of his new Conquists, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and laft Manfion: which Mofes walled with the multitude of his people and cattle. Towards him therefore hailing himfelf, they encountered each other at Jafan: where Schon with his children and people were broken and difcomfited, and the victory fo purified by Mofes, as few or none of the Amorites efaped. He alfo flaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Efehon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as thofe of Basan alfo were, and defended of Emorims, or Amorims: For Mofes calleth the Basanites alfo Amorites. And although Ifraël might now have taken a ready way and paffage into Judaea, being at this time, and after this victory, at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perilous to leave fo great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Basan, or Tracoonitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og a perfon of exceeding ftrengh and ftature, and the only man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of thofe parts, and who at that time had 60 Cities walled and defended bying from the Mountain of Hermom (which Mountain, faith Mofes, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shoin) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Basan (who attended Mofes coming at Edrei) as it did unto Schon: for he and his fons perished, and all his Cities were taken and poffeffed. After this, Mofes with-drawing himfelf back again to the Mountains of Abirim, left the profecution of that War unto unto Jair the Son of Mansfob: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdom of Arabi, even unto the Nations of the Giffiri and Machitis, fixty walled Cities, called the fame after his own name Harab Jair: of all which Conquists afterward the half Tribe of Mansfob poffeffed the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part, that belonged to Schon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Reuben, and unto Gad.

SECT. IX.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Mofes his death.

AFTER thofe victories, and while Ifraël fojourned in the Valley of Moab, the Madianites and Mo-abites (over both which Nations it feemeth that Belie King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) fought, according to the advice of Salam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their Daughters, and by perfwading them to honour and ferve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themfelves: thereby the better both to defend their own intereft againft them, as alfo to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoining. The Ifraelites as they had ever been enflaved, fo were they now callily perfwaded to thefe evil courfes, and thereby drew on themfelves the Plague of Peftilence, wherewith there perished 24000 perfons: beides which punishment of God, the moft of the offenders among the Hebrews, whereby his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the Son of Elezazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simonites, together with Cozbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the Plague ceafed, and Gods wrath was appeafed. For fuch was the love and kindnefs of his all-powerfulnefs, refpefting the ardent zeal of Phineas in profecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews become an Idolater) as he forgave the reft of Ifraël, and itayed his hand for his fake.

In this Valley it was that Mofes caufed the People to be numbered the third time, and there remained of able Men fit to bear Arms 607350, of which, as his laft enterprife, he appointed 12000 to be chofen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Maabites, prafticed with Balaam to curfe Ifraël: and after that, fought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worfhip of the true God, to the fervice of Bel-Peor: and to the reft of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000 Mofes gave the charge to Phineas the Son of Elezazar the fifth Priest: who flew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vaffals of Schon, as appeareth by Jofhua. Thefe five Princes of the Midianites flain by Elezazar, were at this time both the vaffals of Schon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rogem, Zur, Hur, and Rore, the Dukes of Schon, faith Jofhua. He flew alfo the Men, Maad, Children, and Women: faving fuch as had not yet invaded the company of Men, but thofe they faved, and difperfed them among the Children of Ifraël to ferve them.

And Mofes having now lived 120 years, making both his own weaknefs of Body known to the People, and his inability to travel: and alfo that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to afcend the Mountains of Abirim, and thence to render up his life: He hatred to fettle the Government in Jafan, which he perfwaded with moft lively arguments to profecute the Conquest begun, affuring him of Gods favour and affiftance therein. And fo having spent thefe his latter days after the conquest of Og, and Schon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and expofition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to St. Auguftine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the People, which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in Knowledge, Love, Fear, and Service of the all-powerful God: He bled the twelve Tribes, that of Simoen excepted, with levcral and moft comfortable blifings: praifing the greatnefs and goodnefs of him, unto whom in his Prayers he commended them: He alfo commanded the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the fide of the Ark of God. The laft that he intayed, was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Harden ye Hearts, and I will fpeak, and let the Earth hear the words of my Mouth: and being called by God from the labours and forewors of this life, unto that Reft which never afterward hath diftigue, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over againft Bel-Peor: but no Man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day; which happened in the Year of the World, 2554.

SECT. X.

Observations out of the Story of Mofes, how God difpofeth both the fmalleft occasions, and the greateft refiftances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for inftruction, look back to the occafions of fundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Mofes, for (excepting God's miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this People) he wrought in all things elc by the medium of Mens affections, and natural Appetites. And fo we fhall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increafe of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural caufe of the forewors and Iofs, which befel himfelf, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he fought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and leffen, when he commanded all the Male Children of the Hebrews to be flain, God (whose providence cannot be refuted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolifh and falvage craft of mortal Men) moved compaffion in the heart of Pharaoh's own Daughter, to preferve that Child, which afterward became the moft Wife, and of all Men the moft gentle and mild, the moft excellently learned in all Divine and Humane Knowledge, to be the Conductor and Deliverer of his oppreffed Brethren, and the overthrower of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation: even then, when he fought by the ftrengh of his Men of War, of his Horfe, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the duft. The grief which Mofes conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own perfence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to difcover the flughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Midian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jefers's

Jehro's Daughters, made him known to their Father's who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that Solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Law's sheep, far from the press of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the Lot of a poor Herdsman. God found him out in that Desert, wherein he still suffered him to live many years, the better to know the ways and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his People toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, made him know his Will and Divine Pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by God's direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto Men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua; with the sum of the History of Joshua.

SECT. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers ways, as it were, prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner, if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward, we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God as they were, prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Hams; and the rest (as the Edomites, Mobites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were, prepared to be Enemies to the Israelites: as it were, prepared for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the Mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North by the same Mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the Sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part, were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by process of time divided into several Families and Name: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Amalekites, Zuzimmites, or Zuzi, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as Men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hittites, and others, who took name after the Sons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in general was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and strangers in that Country, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or induce them, no more than the Philistines did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himself, being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred who had linked themselves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so far posited themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superior. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Mobites, and Ammonites: of Esaus the Idumeans: of Median the Medians: of Ismael the eldest Son of Abraham, came the Israelites, with whom are joined, as of the same Nation, the Amalekites: whom though the more common opinion think to have been a Tribe of Edom, because Esaus had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong: whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless War decreed against him: but hereof more else elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismael's eldest Son Nabath sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathees. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For of him thence twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tyrris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States did not willingly permit any stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to join themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Idumeans only denied the Hebrews a passage, which the Mobites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the mountains which divided it from Bisjan. Again, that which moved the Mobites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Mobites might hope, after such a time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Valleys and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain, and that the King of Mosh, Balaac, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Mobites, by special occasion, were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be, as it were, prefaces of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier increased by the memory of old grudges: and withal, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Idumeites being descended from the eldest Son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest Son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being natural men, might soon to give place, much less to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the illuses of Esaus, Princes of Idumea, might keep in record, that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob's staking his advantage, and that he before Moses was declared of his Father's blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumea.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a feed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the intigitation of Sarah, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar: and had therein perilled, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his Mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumeans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Esaus took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adah, the daughter of Elen the Hittite: and the other Abolihamah, the grand-child of Zibson the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esaus, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumæa.

Lally, it appeareth that all those Families of the Idumeites, Amalekites, Mobites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jehro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

SECT. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the antient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham (for Melchisedek may be thought to be of a better Pedegree) we find four named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Joshua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergsities, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of Promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principal Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemor, of the Hevites, whom Simon and Levi slew, together with his Son Siechem, in revenge of their Sisters ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the Red Sea: the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumæa.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Mobites out of the West part of Arabia Petræa, or Nabathees, and thrust them over Arnon into the Desert, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Mosh: at which time he took Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Prefently

Presently after which victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Traceni, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Jobites, and of Jerusalem, with whom Jehoshua nameth four other Kings.

Hobam, King of Hebron.
Piram, King of Jarmuth.
Japim, King of Lachis: and Debir, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites, overthrown in battle, and hanged by Jehoshua. After this overthrow Jehoshua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Johab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest: for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before time: was the head of all those Kingdoms.

After these Adonizedek, that notorious Tyrant is named: who confess that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy Kings, enforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after Juda and Simhon had used the flame execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Jerusalem where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Jehoshua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty years after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Rasa (encouraged by Debora) overthrew: and his Captain Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a man driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himself perishing afterward in that War.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathaea, to the South-East of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian Abraham's son, by Cethura. Raguel furnished Gehogelus or Jethero, faith Josephus, called Jeibro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jesuri, or Joksum, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: was Priest or Prince of Necce, Moser married, and of whom, I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moser in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him defended the Kenites, he called of his father Raguel's surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong feasts, and lived in the mountains of the Deserts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I had named, were these:

1. Honor the Hevite of Sichem.
2. Arid of the South parts.
3. Schon of Esblon.
4. Og of Eglon.
5. Adonizedek the Jobites, King of Jerusalem.
6. Hobam of Hebron.
7. Piram of Jarmuth.
8. Japim of Lachis.
9. Debir of Eglon.
10. Jabin of Hazor.
11. Johab of Madon.
12. Adonizedek of Bezek, and 13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* Evi or Evir.

Raguel or Rasim, who built Petra the Metropolis of Petra, so called by the Greeks: and by Esop, cap. 16. v. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called a Reg, 14. 7. where it is also called Jokhebed.

Zar, Hur, and
Reba,
* Oreb, Zeb, Zebah, Zalmunna.

After the death of Barak, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8th of Judges it is written at large. Afterwards in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebah and Salmunna, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners: in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000 of the Madianites, and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

SECT. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I find few that are named: and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Ismaelites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that joined with them (for to them the Amalekites were to have been, and so were the Madianites;) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petraea: For Nabath the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea: which was very fruitful, though adjoining to the Desart in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabathaea: the same which neighbourhood Judea on the East-side. They also possessed a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Naphtali (B) changed into (P.)

Kedar, the second of Ismael's sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Babylon, or Batanea, which was afterward possessed by Minasse, so much thereof as lay within the Mountains Traceni, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius called Kedarani, and Pliny, Cedreani.

Abel sat down in the Desart Arabia, near the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubeni, which Ptolomy calleth Agubeni.

Micham

Micham was the Parent of the Masmeusester, near the Mountain Zamath, in the fame Arabia the Happy. The Raabens were of Micham: who joined to the Orebens, near the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmisi.

Of Duma were the Dumeans, between the Adubeni and Raabens: where the City Dumab sometimes stood.

Of Mafsa the Maffians, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Althrits, who bordered the Napathians in the fame Happy Arabia.
Thama begat the Thamaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thama is seated.

Of Jesur the Imeans, or Camehans: of whom Taba was King in David's time.

Of Naphri, the Nubian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismael's sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Assirs, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agas, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs: and the ancient Arabians, Adad to theirs: and the Arabian Nabathians, Adras, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moser after he past the Red Sea: where of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they joyed with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites near Caderbarn. After the government of Othoniel, they joined them with the Moabites: after Barak, with the Madianites, and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he waited them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In David's time they took Siklag in Simoon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own loss.

In Ezekias time, as many of them as joined to Edumaea, were wasted and displaced by the children of Simoon.

SECT. IV.

Of the inflation of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

HERE lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moser, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt;) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelagius, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withall to make a kind of Meal, and bread of Acorns, who before lived, for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how fallibly those Nations have vaunted of those their Antiquities, accompanied not only with civil Learning, but with all other kinds of Knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augustine Aug. l. 12. have observed, that Prometheus flourished: *Quem c. 8. de Civ. propetia frons de luto formasse hominem, quia optimus vii. Deu. sapientie doctor fuisse prohibetur. Of whom it is reported, that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Thophrastus expounded the invention of Fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inventa sapientie pertinere: To have reference to wisdom, inventions; and Eusebius affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiter's fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestial bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the Art to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but external form and figure. By that notion of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heavenly bodies: for so it is said: *Ido altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno calum quom longissime esset, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret: That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a clear sky discern after off the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly.

Of this mans knowledge Erichylus gives this testimony.

*Alit agachant omni
Ut fons ferbat: donec ipse repperi
Signorum obitus, ortusque qui mortalius
Sunt utitur: & multitudinem Arcium
His repperi: componere inde literas
Mareque Musarum ante ego Memoriam Peruilem cunctis, &c.*

But Fortune govern'd all their works, till when I first found out how Stars did set and rise: A profitable Art to mortal men: And others of like use I did devise: As letters to compose in learned wife I first did teach: and first did amplify The Mother of the Muses, Memorie.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 24 years after Ogyges. Tophyrus faves, that he lived at once with Isaac, who lived with Isaac, Aug. l. 12. c. 3. de Civ. vii. Deu.

There lived also at once with Moser, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moser's days, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Japetus, Aethulus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of those Mountains which with the Sea adjoining, took name, which memory Plato in Critias belongeth on Atlas, the son of Nephele.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express divine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas fignitur Calum, nec Prometheus officium Caucaulo, nec scilicet Cephelus cum uxore tradere, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulae transdidit: Neque should Atlas be said to bear up Heaven, nor Promethe- theus to be fiftened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be bellid, unless their divine knowledge had raised upon their names the ferocious fabler.

Orpheus sometimes exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturn; as, Rheo compunctus alma Prometheus. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction, and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine have not doubted: For the great judgment which Atlas had in Astronomy, faith S. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Phaëder and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons course, of which Arctus the son of Orion challenge the invention. Of this Arctus, Arctadius in Peloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Arctadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, faith Nat. Hist. Comp., before there had been any observation of the Moons course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that below the finding out thereof upon Eudymion: others (as Kenagora) on Typhon: yet Isidore Testator, a curious teacher of Antiquities, gave it Atlas of Lycia: who, besides his gifts of mind, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

SECT. V.

Of Deucalion and Phacton.

AND in this age of the World, and while Atlas was yet living, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, Crotus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, faith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for his wife; thence Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odes, makes Deucalion the son of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses, after his return from Troy, assigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this later Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that War) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Mos, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Thessaly, those people exceeded in all kind of wickedness and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attrache of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their four times perill by waters: as in the time of Nodus, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that general destruction by the flood universal. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God purified, were both of them deemed to be possessors of Vertue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

*Non illi melior quisquam, nec amantior equi
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior illa decurram.*

None man was better, nor more just than he: Nor any woman godlier than thee.

It is also affirmed, that Prometheus fore-told his son Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himself a kind of Vessel, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because of these circumstances, they afterward add the fending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease. I should verily think that Story had been but an imitation of Noah's flood devised by the Greeks, did not the time so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverend Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had these two of more note, Hellen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas; and Melanthe, on whom Nephele is said to have begot Dolphus, which gave name to Dorset, far renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no less strange and marvelous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened under Phacton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Libya, a Region in Italy, and about Coma, and the Mountains of Vesuvius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many frange fables.

SECT. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUT of all these, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned: the fame which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes. Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the god of Thieves, the god of Wretlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the fame with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant. Cicero, Clodius Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greek reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did Targememotus; the other that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians; and to have given them Laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought Learning and Letters out of Egypt into Greece: to which Plato also confirmeth, saying: That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Thoth: whom Philo Bolytus writeth Tautus; and the Egyptians, Thoth's the Alexandrines, Thot; and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Tautus, Sancianobolus, who lived about the War of Troy, gives the invention of Letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, takes either of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth neither of them to have slain Argus. For he finds this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which lived while Mos was yet young. And yet L. Viter upon S. Augustine seems to understand them to be the fame with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembered. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought Letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, if there be any truth in prophane Antiquity; that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt.

Aug. de Civ. Dei. l. 18. c. 10. ex Eusebio et Hieronymo.

For they all confest, that Cadmus brought letters first into Beotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Mos and Cadmus, there were these descendants call; Crotus King of the Argives, with whom Mos lived, and in whose time about his tenth year Mos died; after Crotus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven years; after him Danaus fifty years; after him Linurus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Beotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Mos's time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom S. Augustine remembereth, the one the Grand-father, the other the Nephew or Grand-child, come out of Greece. Expolonus and Arctianus note, that Mos's found out letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews: of whom the Phœnicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Mos, for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Jews and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Finicus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose works he commenteth, to have been four decedents after Mos; with which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Mos, the maternal Grand-child of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsellor and Instructor of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Finicus giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an Inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lod. Viter upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of Saint Augustine, de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was mentioned by Ter Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-child; * Sancianobolus an ancient Phœnician, who lived shortly after Mos, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phœnicians, Tautus, and by the Egyptians, Thoth, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is said to have lived, to wit, three hundred years, gave occasion to some Writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those who have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophy and Divinity, he is found more ancient than Mos; because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisdom, wherein it is said, that Mos was excellently learned.

been found in all things like themselves: I think it had not been perillous to have thought with Eusebius, that this Hermes was Mos's himself; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was devised by the first, and more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joseph, the son of Jacob: whom, after the expolition of Pharaoh's dreams, they called Sapaneaphane, which is as much to say, as Abundantior repletor; a Finder out of hidden things. But these are over-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: *He L. 1. c. 6. 4. scriptis libris, et quidem multis, ad cognitionem divinorum rerum pervenirent, in quibus Mositanum appellat, quibus nos, Dæm & Patrem; He hath written many Books belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majesty of the most High, and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we do. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sibilis and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgments to those Idoctrinuous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians: as for my self I am persuaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereto, was by corruption infected. For thus much himself contesteth: Dæm omnium Dæmonius, & Pater, fons & vita, pateris & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & ipso ipsi sunt. Verum enim eo quis est prodians, persistentium excitator, & generator, & opifex, &c. God (faith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the Fountain and Life, and Power, and Light, and Mind, and Spirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himself proceeding, most perfect, generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful Nature, made it also fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (faith Snyder) called Ter Maximus, quia de Trinitate loquens est, in Trinitate non esset Dæm affertur: Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. He rinitum (faith Finicus) prædixit præter Religio-nis, hic omnium novæ fidei, hic advenit Christi, hic futurum judicium, resurrectionem seculi, beatum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercury forswore the name of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new Faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future Judgement, the Resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the Wicked or Damned.*

To this I will only add his two last speeches reported by Cicero the Platonist, and by Valerius out of Stygian. Hælium, fili, pulvis à patris, vixi prægrævis & esul, nunc innotam repas, Conque post paulum à vobis corporis vinculis absolute difficilis, videte me quæ mortuum lægavit: nam ad illam optamam beatitudinem Civitatem regressor, ad quam nunc vixi Civis mortui conditione venturi sunt. Ibi quævis solus Deus est summus Princeps, qui Civis fides replet suavitatis mirifica: ad quam huc, quam multi vixum excitant, mors est potius decedens quam vita; Hælium, O son, being driven from my Country, I have lived a stranger and banished man: but now I am repaired homeward again in safety. And when I shall after a few days (as in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood, depart from you, you shall see me as a man dead; for I do but return to that best and blessed City, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with sweetness more than marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life.

The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words, with Synclis: O Calum, magni Dei spiritus episcopus: Episcopus Patris quantum primum confis, quando universum confisit mundum, ad hoc per ingenium eius Verbum, & Spiritum, confis comprehendit, Miserationem meam: I ad hoc the O Heaven, thou wise work of the great God, and the voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World, by his only begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, bece more upon me.

But Synclis hath his invocation in these words: Obsecro te Calum, magni Dei spiritus episcopus, obsecro te reco Patris, qui in loquutus est primum com omnem mundum in fructu, obsecro te per ingenium Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius ego; I beseech thee O Heaven, wise work of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, which he spoke first when he created all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

SECT. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

There were also in this age both Astulapins, which after his death became the God of the Physicians, being the brother of Mercureus, as Protes thinks in his Commentary upon Angustine, de Crustate Dæ, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious Act excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day: and yet Mose himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with Devils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldom came out of his mouth: however by the Synclis they are called Sophists, or Peosists, and Inventors: Sophists, Peosists, and Inchanters: by Phorone, Sophists, & Malici: Wife men, and evil doers: and by Parablar, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magick: calling them exagwos, workers by Drugs. The Grecians, Sorcerers and Inchanters: Junius, Sapienter, Præfigniter, & Magi. Magicians and Wife men here by him are taken in one fence: and Præfigniter are such as deal in enchanments, and make them seem to see what they see not: as false colours, and false tastes. But as fine virtues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded: and the one taken for the other (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and working of Mose, and of Phorone's Sorcerers appear in outward show, and to the holders of common capacities, to be one and the same Art and gift of knowledge. For the Devil changeth himself into an angel of light: and imiteth in all he can the ways and workings of the most High. And yet, on the contrary, every work which sheweth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, are such, as where he hath bestowed the knowledge to understand their hidden and best virtues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above Nature or Art: in which two speculations of works of Nature, and of Miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names: Opus de Borefin, &

Opus de Mercana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturæ: The Wisdom of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis: The Wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in breeding the pious Lambs in Misopotamia: the other Mose exercised in his Miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of Nature: of the other he as far as pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them: assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. All S. Augustine noteth, of Ysaiah, divers other famous men lived in the World, who, after their deaths, for their eminent Vertues, and Inventions, were numbered among the Gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Libet Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Mosaic plays at Apollonia: thereby to regain his favour, who brought barneels and fecundity upon that of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple, and set on fire: so did Eritibianus institute the like Games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyl, in memory of her that first press it out of the Olive.

In this Age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radmantulus, Sarpidon and Minos: which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules: the one to whom the twelve Labours are ascribed, native of Tyrrhinia a City of Poloponnis: (or, as others say, only misread and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there: being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius turneth Dolphin, famous in Plænia; nor that Hercules, according to Philophrastus, which came to Gader, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manusfium sit, non Thebanum Philophrastus. Hercules, sed Egyptium ad Gader pervenisset, & ibi finem suæ vite fecisset. (saith Philophrastus): I it in manusfium, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the fringes of Gader, and there determined the bounds of the Earth. In this time also while Mose wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthysoever they were that lived in the Days and Age of Mose, there was never any Man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things: whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared: with Angels: never any Man more familiar and conversant with Never: never any more learned both in Divine and Humane Knowledge: never a greater Prophet in Israhel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire: the first that left to posterity by Letters, the truth and power of one infinite God: his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the Creatures therein: that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Synclis calleth Mose the beloved of God and Man, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies: made him glorious in the sight of Kings, showed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithful prayers, and made him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors: as by Clæarchus the Peripatetic: by Magellanes, and Numerius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the Patristicks enjoyed before the flood, remembered by Mose, Ephraim, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Elancus, nicius, Asclutus, Ephorin, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The universal flood which God revealed unto Mose, Berofus, Niclaus Damasceus, and others, have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Alydenus, Ephraim, and Sybilis have approved. Berofus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a book of him. Damasceus before cited, speaketh of Abraham passage from Damasceus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Mose. Eusebius writeth the very fane of Abraham, which Mose did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Cammeria, or Orion, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrology of the Caldeans was invented. Is justitia pietateque sua (his Eusebius out of the same Author) se De gratus suit, in divino precepto in Phoenicem veniens, ibique habitat in: For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phenicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book and fifth Chapter, speaketh reverently of Mose: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Mose, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Mose, who writeth of Mose in these words: Mosis animus affirmatus, deob que Egyptios non relie sentire, qui hominem & peccatum in ignem Dei tribuerant: Itaque Africus & Grecos, qui dis hominum figuram affirmant: id vero solum ipse Dæmon, quod nos, & terram, & mare continet, quod Calum, & Mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus, corpus perceptu imaginem non fasse necesse, aliquid extremum vixit, que per se in finem, similem autem descript figere. Proinde, com simulaculorum effigiem repudiata di ignem in Templum ac Delubrum contingendum, ac fine aliqua figura colendum: Mosis affirmatus et tæget, that the Egyptians thought an angel, which attributed unto God the image of beasts and cattle: Al that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their gods the shapes of men: veritas that only is God indeed, which containeth both the earth and sea, which we call Heaven, the World, and the nature of all things, whose image, double is, no wise man will dare to fashion unto the likeness of these things, which are conspicuous. That therefore all desiring of Idols can aspire: a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and to be to be without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which Abel, 13. the Martyr Stephen commended Mose, saying, That Mose was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his work and words: the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Lactantius, Lambertus, Phil Judeus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguished into Geometry, Astronomy, Aritmetick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For Geometry, which is by interpretation, Measuring of Grounds, was useful unto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowed and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomy: the site of the Country being a level and spacious Plain, free and clear from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Aritmetick alikewise, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied: because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick, they made no other account, nor desired further knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnify their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Natural part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetic Philosophy: teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things: that of it all mixt bodies, and living creatures have their being: that Heaven is round like a Globe: that all Stars have a certain fervor heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced: that Rains proceed and be from mutations in the Air: that the Planets have their proper foulds, &c.

The Divine part of this Wisdom, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the World had a beginning, and shall perish: that Men had their first original in Egypt: partly by means of the temperateness of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offensive, and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in those places: That the soul is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body: That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true Similitudes of the gods are not known: that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortal men, and after death, for their virtues and benefits bestowed on ranking, have been deified: that those Beasts and fowls Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adduced for Gods: because under the Emblems they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptians Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, mystical, and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole sum of this latter Egyptian Learning into three several sorts, viz. Epi, 1. 5. Solar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetical in obscure and figurative words: as for example, where it is written: The Lib by the Hieron participate the beauty of the Hawk: which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty. The other symbolical, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Ænigmatical: Imitative, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified: as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon itself: Tropical or transference, which applies the divers forms and figures of natural bodies or creatures, to figure the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections and actions of their Gods, and of Men. So with the Egyptian Divines the Image of an Hawk signifieth God: the figure of the Horne signifieth the Sun: the picture of the Bird Thib signifieth the Moon: by the form of a Man, Prudence and Skillfulness: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood. Ænigmatical, is a composition, or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which fence the monstrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was given on their Temples and Altars, to signify, that to

For it is not, as faithless men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his presence, that this Promise (if it be broken) is broken to Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promise is the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein profess that we fear him not, and that we fet him at naught, and deie him. If he that without relevation of Honour, giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Supriour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himself, or to his Supriour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, promifeth in his Name, and makes him a witness of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Decd of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contracts which have been made in former times and confirmed by publick Faith. For though it were 400 years after Jofua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughtered some of those people defended of the Gibonites; yet God, who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israhelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a continuing famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Saul's sons were delivered to the Gibonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, to give a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to refuse in silence a contrary intent: the life of Man, the estates of Men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, betwixt usander. It is by Oath (when Kings and Armies cannot pass) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by Oath that Wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an Oath thus powerful, but this; That he that sweareth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witness, and in whose presence he that taketh the Oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whosoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only lose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the first King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadob, and his Vicegerent. The Sultan Sinar, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syracen to their aid: whose Nephew Saladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Cross (the very Crois, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Saladine, when they brought it into the held as their last refuge, seeing they had foretorn themselves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a Lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great victory over Amurat the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most advantageous that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the War. And though the said King was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battell with 30000 Christians, and his own life. But I will flay my hand: For this swift volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgments upon Faith-breakers; be it again Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of Oaths now-a-days, is rather made a matter of custom, than of conscience.

Psalm 56. Ghoſt, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and Psalm 111. that the mouth which uttereth them, destroyeth his soul:

It is also very remarkable, That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israhel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and, as it is said in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to provoke them, and to teach them to make Yahweh. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remain in the Canaanite possession all the time of Jofua; but soon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforced to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest access. And those of Judah were not able to be masters of their own Vallies; because, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principal Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoining unto Judab, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines: as Ascalon, Gath, Aſdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasseh over Jordan expel the Geshurites, nor the Maachabites which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Transjordan.

Nor the Nephthaim possess themselves of Beſheth-niſh, nor of Beſhanab; but they inforced those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Aſher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Aon, Atlab, Abeſh, Heblab, Aphike, and Rehol, nor inforced them to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kiron, and Nabaloth, but received tribute from them. All the Canaanites dwell in Gezer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasseh, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Beſhethan, Taanah, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo; yea Jerusalem it self did the Jehusites defend above four hundred years, even till David's time.

Now Jofua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Israhel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Jofephus gives him five and twenty years: Seder Olam Rabbi, the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie, eight and twenty; and Maffius six and thirty: Maimonides by Maffius, fourteen: Joannes Lucidus, seventeen: Cassianus, ten: Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty; and doth S. Augustine Melanbion, two and thirty: Codman, five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480 years from the delivery of Israhel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple; it is necessary that we allow to Jofua only eighteen of them; as holding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and as I think, a well-approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480 years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of error, such as have inserted erted years between Jofua and Obadiel, of whom Eusebius finds eight years, to which Arius Montanus addeheth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Jofua: Bunting reckons it nine Years: Bæſetzer and Renſor but one's Codman, twenty; and Niephorus no less than three and thirty: whereas following the sure direction of these 180 Years, there can be no void years round between Jofua and Obadiel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Jofua by the account already specified. The praſes and acts of Jofua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Eusebius, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him living to him, for he fought the Battels of the Lord.

That he wrote the Book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, verse 26, And Jofua wrote these words in the Book of the Law of God; which seemeth rather to have been meant by the Covenant which Jofua made with Israhel in Shiloh, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord: which promise Jofua caused to be written in the Book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and Abbotſſe: The clearest doth likewise conceive, that the Book of Jofua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intitled Libor Jofuorum, remembered by Jofua himself; and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these words of the 26th Verse, And Jofua wrote these words, &c. this placeth nothing in it to prove it: for when the People had answered Jofua The Lord our God will be for us, and his voice will be obeyed, it followeth that Jofua made Covenant with the People, and wrote the same in the Book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Jofua, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke Beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) lived the fifty Sons of Egeus, all but Linceus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Jofua, Phaenix, and Cadmus, and near the end of Jofua's life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the Daughter of Phoenix (afterward married to Aſtræus King of Greece). But St. Augustine reports this ravishment to be committed by Antheus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Dædalus, and Dædalus to Phaenix, who was an old Man at the War of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong Man at the same Trojan War. And so doth Nifon reckon up in the Council of the Groks, Thyſon and Perithous for Men of Antiquity and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But heretofore

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israhel that were planted in the borders of Phoenicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

SECT. I.

The Proem to the description of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Jofua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samaria: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theatres, whereon the greatest part of the Story passeth with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood, and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungrateful for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot neglected the Lord of all power, and adored their dead and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina laus (saith Augustine) Ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericordia in temporibus.

Idem adhibet severitatem, ne eternam justitiam in seculum ultionem; The Divine goodness is especially therefore angry in this World, that it may not be angry in the World to come, and doth mercifully use temporal severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternal vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-wealths: and to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this subject: among whom, because I find to great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own reason, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistines, and the Lands of Or and Sebon Kings of Byſus, and the Arabian Armies, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessary first to divide and bound the general, and so to descend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was antiently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea; and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pomus, called Lecrochians, or white Syriani. But taking it thence, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idume, towards the South, Tigis towards the Sea-rifing, and the Mediteranean Sea Westward: it then containeth betwixt Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews Syria, the two Rivers, to wit, Tigis and Euphrates, for so Aran Nabarajim is expounded: also Padin Aram: that is, Jugum Syria, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Carthage, which the Latins call Syria Crea, because it lay in that fruitful Valley between the Mountains of Lybannus, and Antilibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Lascheta, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascus, or Syria Lybaniaca, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybannus. The Royal city of the Assyrians, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the Province of Sophone, or Syria Soba, Chobis, or Zobis: over which Adadocor commanded in Salomon's time. Then Phenicia, and the People Syraphonians: and lastly, Syria Palestina bordering Egypt: of which Pholony maketh Judea Prova, after a sort: and to that Province which Moses calleth Sor and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syria Judea.

SECT. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

But that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybannus to the great Deserts between Idume and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hormon, Galad, and Annon towards the East: the same Hills which Sirabos calleth Tresoni, or Tracouira, and Ptolomeus, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Cham: Phoenicia appellat fuit Canaan. The language was also called Canaan, fith Mont Anon, and after Hebræa of the Hebrews, who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to S. Augustinus. But Aras Montanus not to well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all thofe of Canaan's Sons, who past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, fith he, is as much as transfers, or transmissions of going, or passing over. And because the Children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigismund, and of Enschius long before them both. It had also the name of Judea from Judas, and then afterwards intituled the Holy Land, because thence our Sacrament Christ was Born, and Buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four: namely into Edom, otherwise Sor, or Idumea Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is doubtless, the superiour call'd Genitium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phenicia. Now besides these Provinces of Phenicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth) living that Phenicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus: that part also of the East of Jor- dan, and within the Mountains of Hormon, Galad, and Annon, otherwise Tracuni, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, and therefore are accounted apart of Canaan also: as well because anciently possit by the Amurrites for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites: which Easternmost parts are again divided into Basin, or Batania, unto Galad, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Maachis, Gessuri, Argobis, Hur. They are known to the late Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general: and by the names of Tracounis, Phenicia, Batania, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Ruben, for these are his words: *Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gezar until Azasib (which is Gazur) and this was the length of the Country North and South: then it followeth in the Text Ad as thou goest unto Sadom and Gomorrah, and Azasib, and Schibim, even unto Lufis: by which words Moses stretcheth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written: All the places whereon the foot of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: no coast shall be from the W. Idem, 24. and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Country North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon, and the Wilderness for Gezar and Azasib, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, it Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never possit: nor at any time did so much as invade, or attempt. And therefore Volcanus does conceive that by the River Perah was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Job 23. 4. *Behold, I have divided unto you by the Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan, with all the Nations that I have divided, even unto the great Sea of the Westward.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put in genus amicitiae and comprocur, for David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Affrica, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possit of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperturbed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not only to include them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow: but therein and elsewhere to subvert them unto those idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves acknowledged and obeyed. And fure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the Hebrews were above the Earth, was tied to thofe conditions, both in the Verbs preceding, and subsequent: which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect: who knew that all forces for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, then while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joyed to the prosperity of Israel.

Israel. For therein it is written: Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, which I have sworn unto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the Hebrews were above the Earth. For if ye keep diligently, faith he, all these Commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all thofe Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerful Majesty, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot mislike that expolition of Malacthon: For, faith he, Offendit promissionem precipuum non offe de hoc politico Regno. Si bene sit, his chief promissio est not a civil Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which St. Hierome made to a certain Heretic in his Epistle ad Dardanium, who accused St. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat vivendum terram qui in calli est: (that is) Only to that Land of the living which is in Heaven. Quoniam tota Judeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160 miliarium, latitudinem vero 40 & in ista circiter loca, urbes, & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Judeis occupata, sed tantum divina petitione promissis, & fidei whole Country of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160 miles in length, and 40 miles in breadth, and in these Countries, Places, Cities, and many Towns, which the Jews never possit, have only been granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esaie, touching the blessings promised unto Jerusalem, where he hath these words: *Pro quo dicimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina regione potestatem, qua totius Provincia, determia est: & Jacobi monibus asperior, & penuriam patitur fuit: ita ut obsequis utatur plevis, & raritatem fontium exterminum occidit fider: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, solitabantur fructores tui: From whence, faith he, we learn, that Jerusalem is not to be sought in the region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and edged with craggy Mountains, and suffred the penury of the Soil: so as it prefereth rain Water, and supplyeth the scarcity of Wells by building of Cisterns: but this Jerusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Tu builderis domus habundans: so far St. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself: *Neque hoc dico in figuratione terre Judee, in hereticis Synagoga mentium: aut quo asseram historia veritatem, que fundamemum est intelligentie spiritualis: sed ut deatam superfluum Judeorum, qui Synagoga angelicus laudum Ecclesie preferunt: Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, offendunt terram promissionis latere & melle manentem: Neque (fith he) I say this to disgrace the land of Judea, as the heretic Sophyran doth believe: or to take away the truth of the History, which is the Foundation of spiritual understanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the fruits of the Synagoga further than the breadth of the Church: For if they follow only the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them show the Land of promise, flowing with Milk and Honey.

By this it may also be gathered, however it be unlikely (seeing the Well-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literal sense, that En- phrazer or Perah, which is made the East-bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Hieron's opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perah were not to be understood for Euphrates, and that the promise itself was never so large: much less the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Affor, Nephthim, and Zabulon held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Affor for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speak, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes as be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversely exprest, so that to the unskillful they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have: and partly, because the Ancient exprest or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the later do think fit.

SECT. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

§. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

The Asherites descended of Asher the Son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500 and odd persons, all men above twenty years of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: at which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides Women and Children, 33400 bodies fit for the Wars: which past the River of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, and after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon and the Fields of Libanus, unto Palestina along almost the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oyl, and Wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecy, After pignus panis: Concerning Affor, his Bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

§. II.

Of Zidon.

The first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Affor, was Zidon, which Josias calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks and Strabo make Agenor the founder thereof: and Josias derives the name from the abundance of Fish found on thofe shores: whereof it hath been called Zidonia. But that it was far more ancient, Melchior, Tafus, and Josaphus witness, as doth the fame being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sons, and so strong it was in Josias's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Affixion, or any of their successours matter it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ: a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Elyas, Joram, Ezechieh, and Zachariah, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies Sadon, and by the Pestilence.

Zidon is located on the very wash of the Phoenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-Land Sea, etc. It hath to the North the City of Berytus, and the River Lentis: and to the South Sarpis, or Sarphit, which standeth between it and Tyre: the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is fourteen thousand paces, faith Seigniorius: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Wessingbury in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new Scale to the Map and Description of the Holy Land.

What Things it had till Agenor time there is no memory: the story which Zen the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time confounded and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre: which was also built by the Zidonians. For as  Strabo* noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon; and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacy, and became far more renowned, especially the principal workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of Learning, so did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zachary calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by Nature and Art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadel on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessible Rock, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South-side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also fell many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, in to places remote: as unto Thebes, and Siphyn, Cities of Æthiopia in Græce, Strabo And Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of * Glasses, which they used to make of those Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, near Ptolomis, or Acon: and from whence the Phoenicians fetch the matter of those clear Glasses which they make at Murana: of which St. Hieron and Pliny: Zidon insignis artificum: Zidon vitrarum officinis nobilis. Zidon a famous Glass-maker, or a skilful worker in Glass-houses.

* It seems that even in Typhus, since they practised glass-making, whence Strabo calleth Siphyn, both majus, quam al verbum is as much as combustionis apparatus, reals furnace vitrarum, Jes. 11. 8. as it seems, because these Furnaces were there was store of Water, either for the moving of the Belows that force of the Water, or for the necessary use. But there are others that take them for Salt-pits, and others again for hot Baths.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Chanaan (as Fineas gathered out of 1 Sam. 31. 10, and Judg. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1 Reg. 5. theep, for Deut. 7. 13, the word in the plural number signifieth sleep 1 and this may confirm Agenor opinion, that Astarte was Juno: for the term of her husband Japhet Hammon was a Ram.

11. 5. in the Story of Solomon's Idolatry, where Astarte is called the god of the Zidonians; and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Acab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that marrying Jezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plural names of Basim, and Astarte, 1 Sam. 12. 10, and elsewhere: for even the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skilful Hebrician, is plural: the singular being Astareh: whence Judg. 2. 13, the Septuagint read ἀστάρων τὸν ἀστέρον. They worshipped the Astarte. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Astartes, may be diversly understood: either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the fables depending upon them: which (as fables use to be) were doublets in divers Cities divers. Augustine quest. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrans) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. Tully, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making Dionysius of the name of Venus, expounds the name of Astarte: whom he makes to be born of Tyrrus and Syria, and to have been the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius. 2. Satur. cap. 21. says, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Affrians: and Hiemone upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thamuz, (whom there the Idolaters in common are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their Songs of Adonis: Musen for Adonis the fair, dead is Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thamuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose loss of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus loss of Adonis. And to this agreement that which Plutarch hath, de Iside et Osiride that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammon: which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiel's Thamuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus antiently fortified with the Milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moses and the Prophets for many years, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke: Wo be to thee Canaan, etc. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrrus and Zidon, they had repented long ago, etc. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrrus and Zidon at the day of judgment, than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocese of Tyre. But in the year of our Redemption 636 it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their possession till Baldwin the first, then King of Jerusalem: in the year 1111, by the help of the Danes and Norwages, who came with a Fleet to visit the Holy Land, and took Portat Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gremos, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the year 1250 it was re-edified and strengthened by Lodowick the French King: while he spent four years in the War of the Holy Land. Lastly, in the year 1289 it was re-conquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turks, and hath the name of Zai.

¶ III.

¶ III.

Of Sarpis, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarpis, or after that Hebrew, Sarphat, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing near it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mibi non sunt Gazetia, Chia, Falerna, Quæque sacparentis palmita missa bibas.

I have no Wine of Gaza, nor Falerna Wine, Nor any for the drinking of Sarpis's Vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Diocese of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest: and is now called Sapht, faith Poghelus.

Nor far from Sarpis was situated that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose Fleet of Ships commanded, and gave Law over all the Mediterranean Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrans erected Utes, Lepiti, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil, Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyris inæne Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Cades. In Italy, Nola: in Ajia the less, Dromus Achillis, which City the Statius of Apollonius placeth near the River Phidius in Bythia.

It had antiently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Isaiah 19. taking name from the situation: because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ojrum Sarraenum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day: the place being still known by the name of the antient Tyre: and because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Ely calleth it the Daughter of Zidon: which Trogus also confirmeth, though Boetius by affinity of name makes Tyris the Son of Typhus to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was antiently, (for so much the Prophet Ely also witnesseth, Ir nos this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of antient days: yet that Thors the Son Japhet bet himself in the bottom of the Canaanites, who built Zidon, and people all that Region, I see nothing to persuade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curcius: and Josephus and Enochius make this City older than Solomon's Temple 240 years: Cedreanum 365: who also addeth, that Tyrrus the Wife of Agenor, gave it this name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700 paces from the Continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middle of the Seas, as some read: or as others, in the inner-most part of the Sea; whence he calleth it finemata at the entry of the Sea: As also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mare of the people for many life: and Elyas, a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City as the Prophet Ely calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning and in manufacture: especially in the making and dyeing of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, faith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Seacoast, and eating of the Fifth Conchilis or Porpora, the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrans presented him with a Crown of Gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Deity of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they lent him City, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious: he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many Ships as he could, and brought from Lybanon to Great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty Stones from the old City of Tyre adjoining, as, notwithstanding that this materials were often wait away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never retired, till he had made a Foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their Walls, he overtopped them with Towers of Wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted: after which he cauld 2000 more to be hung up in a rank all along the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authors affirm) upon the issues of those families which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrans, Trogus remembereth: and how Sanaball revolted from Darius, and came to Alex Jud. 11. 2. pa or Provincial Governor, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manasse, Brother to Jaddai the high Priest of Jerusalem, obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garizim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in Obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his Son-in-Law Manasse, whom the Jews opposed, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaball, whom Gul, Tyrrus called Sanaball, Jer. 13. 4.

Long before this defolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanassar the Affrian King: when the growing pride of the Affrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three score Ships of War held the Port: to the end that neither any Victuals nor any supply of Men might enter it: but the Tyrans with twelve fail scattered that Feet, and took 1500 Prisoners of the Affrians: notwithstanding the Affrians continued his resolution, and lay before it by his Lieutenants five years, but with ill success. And this siege Menander Ephorus, cited by Trogus, made Er com. report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrans (which the said Menander converted into Greek) adding, that Eluleu, whom Sarpis 14. Tyrrus called Heliphe, was then King of Tyre, ha-Tyrrus 14. ying governed the same fix and twenty years. Jer. 49. 15.

Soon

Soon after this repulse of Salmanassar; and about 200 years before the victory of Alexander, Nebuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Jerusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despicable work of joyning it to the Continent. For Nebuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawley and passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Against Nebuchodonosor, for many years, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, faith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Elijah had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after 13 years siege or more, the Tyrians depoyed of all their hopes, and remembering over-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of Ships, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the sabbit of all that remained: and with their Wives, Children, and portable riches, sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satiate for many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that War: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengtheneth this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nebuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdom and the spoil thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierom saith, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action to attain unto that eternal happiness reserved for his Servants and Saints: yet such is the boundless goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nebuchodonosor's against Tyre, prophane Historians have not been silent. For both Diodorus and Pliny (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phoenician Histories, remember it.

After these two great Victories by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it self again: and continued in great glory about 500 Years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith near 600 years: the Archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Jerusalem only, who within his own Dioceses had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphyria, Aeon, or Polomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Caesarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthofa, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Toris) and Maracuta. But in the year 636 it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phoenicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracen: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488 years.

In the year 1112 it was attempted by Baldovine King of Jerusalem; but in vain: yet in the year 1124, by Guarnemond, Patriarch of Jerusalem, Viceroy to Baldovine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their Fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered and subjected to the Kings of Jerusalem, and so it remained 165 years.

Finally, in the year 1185, Saladin having first taken Jerusalem, removed his whole Army, and fate down before Tyre: drawing his Fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then only remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain ratters of Timber, fired, burnt, and brake the Saracens Fleet, and sayled out rebellly upon his Army, flew to great numbers of them; and following their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory, the body of that famous Fredrick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christian enemies over a River unfordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, near unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origins, grarnified and graven with guilt pillars of Marble, 940 years before therein buried: but in the year 1289 the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

§. IV.

Of Polomais, or Aeon.

THE third City along the coast of the Sea, which the Affricans could not obtain, on the South bound of Affer, was Aeco, which was the antient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authors affirm, that it took name from Aeon the Brother of Polomais. Pliny calleth it Aeo: and otherwise the Colony of Chusidius. It had also the name of Cath, or Cod, aid by Zoghris it is called Hattips.

But lastly, it was intitled Polomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Polomies: which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11, another of the Polomies inidentally wrested from his Son-in-law Alexander, who called himself the Son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Chusidius daughter of the said Polomies, not long hence. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabean treacherously surprised and slain, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48, by the perfidiousness of Tybores, whom soon after Antiochus pushed, as it is 10.

The Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the afore said Alexander in the War against Demetrius, one of the Sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Eutolmy joyined, overthrown and treacherously murdered by Zabdel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his Father-in-law Polomies: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three days, for 18.

God struck him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his Regal seat: two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Jerusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamboris: from Tyre, Antimus maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middle of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple Herald of Belshazzar: and therefore called the Castle of Phier, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual Light, like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the Night to those Ships who came near and sought that port. It had in it a Bishop's seat: fear of the Dioceses of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636 (a fatal year to the Christian in those parts) it was forced and taken by Huamarsus the Saracen. In the year 1104 it it was regained by Baldovine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa, to whom a third of the revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourscore and seven, Saladin King of Aegypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291 it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000, entered, took, and utterly demolished: though in some fort afterward rededified, and it is now Turkish.

§. V.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

FIVE miles from Polomais towards the East, is a Castle of St. George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every Man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors really have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those days, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or purlion feigned. The place is described by Ardicrimus in his description of Affer, to have been in the fields of Lybanus, between the River Adonis, and Zidon: his own words are these: Hoc loco qui ad incolis Cappadocia appellatur non longe à Beryta, memorant incolentes Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filium ab immenso filio Dracone aversisse: campum molitua bestia parenti restituisse. In ejus rei munusculum Ecclesia postmodum fidei adificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the Beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thus far Ardicrimus. His Authors he citeth Lodovicus Romain, Petrus Nivertianus l. 1. c. 3, and Brutius lib. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorical, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Ant. Marcellinus.

§. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BETWEEN Polomais and Tyre along the Sea-coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Aczibus, which S. Hierome called Achezibi, and Josephus Esdempus, Pliny Ecdippus, one of those which defended it against the Affricans. Bellisrogi finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castles of Alexander to be one, but I know not from whence he had it.

The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, travelled as far to the North as Roth, or Rebosh, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rebosh, as also Beothy, which by Ezekiel, cap. 47. ver. 16, is placed in the North borders, belonging in David's time to the King Hadrachar, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel, chap. 8. ver. 8, and chap. 10. ver. 6, and it deniceth it self against the Affricans, as Zidon, Tyre, Achezibi, Polomais, Alab, Holbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek was, whose wall falling down, flew seven and twenty thousand of Benhadad's Soldiers, after that a hundred thousand had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Abish. Here Junius finds that the Philistines encamped a little before the battel at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel the 9. & 1. he takes Aphek, there mentioned (at which Battel the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which Jof. 15, and 53; and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Fortiter, 104, in 29. Aphek. Where others convert it, Perotinus Syrus in 1.

The next place along the coast is Sandalium, first called Sandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander: for Alexander Macedon built it when he besieged Tyre, and set it on a point of Land which extendeth itself into the Sea, between Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldovine the first rebuilt and fortified: in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a Mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of Water, which Solomon remembereth, called the Well of Living Water: whence not only all the Fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large Pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a Bow-shot of Ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short passage, faith Brochius.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Aczeph, or Aczib, after S. Hierome, Acyph, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Jefus at the Waters of Maron.

§. VII.

Of Thoron, Gisfala, and some other places.

FURTHER in the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sauto Abdonas built on the Easternmost hills of Tyre, in the year 1107; thereby to refrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Tyron, famous in the story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Countable to Baldovine the third King of Jerusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: whereof four are feared almost of equal distance from each other: to wit, Castrum, Lamperis, Manfort, Idun (or Saron) Castrum, Regium, and Belfort: the first near the Sea under the Hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Idun, Manfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Temonies, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Polomais Aebon. The third fortress was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Nar, near the City Rams: of which in this

* Of two Cities of this name in Juda, see Job. 1. four and twenty Kings against Jofhua: who being all overthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerful City was by Jofhua taken and burnt to dust. But in the process of time the same being re-built by the Canaanites, a second King Jabin, 137 years after the death of this first Jabin, invaded the Israelites: and this Tribe being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude 20 years; till Deborah the Prophetess overthrew Sisera, Jabin's Lieutenant, and his Army, near Tabor. This City Solomon reduced at Job. 19. 7. the Mountain Tabor. This City Solomon reduced at such time as he also re-edified Cezar, burnt by Pharaoh of Egypt, with * Megidda, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260 years after, it fell into the hands of Tiglathpalsar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, faith Adricomius, called Antiochia: it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis. There is another City of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, seated on the confines of Afulam, called the new Hazor, faith Jerom.

Nam. 24. 8. Allo in Simeon Charfor S. Sina, of which 1 Chron. 4. 31. which also is called Charfor S. Sina, and Charfor S. Sina, and lastly, Charfor S. Sina, another City of Simeon, Jud. 19. 3. * 1 King. 9. Utherim, loc. Hebr. 1. 4. out of Neb. 11. 33. as it seems.

§. III.

Of Casarea Philippi.

There was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephthalim, that renowned City of Lais, Jud. 18. 27. or Lejibeth, as Junius writes it, or Lejeben; which City the children of Dan (being straitened in their Territory under Juda) invaded and maltreated; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dau: and by that name it is written in Gen. 14. at which place Abraham surpris'd Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobab, formerly remembered in the division of Syria, otherwise called Sophona. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joint name of Lejebeth-Dan. Wessingburg writes it Lacir, the Genezis, Lajib; Josephus, Dan; Benjamin, Belina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness, Neubrigenst, Tyrus, Volaterranus, Buchard the Monk, and Pestellus: who also taketh this City to be the same, which in Matth. 15. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Mark, speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free City, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written Judg. 18. And there was none to help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other men: for it was above thirty English miles from the Mediterran Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these Regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Paness, from a Fountain adjoining to it: and therefore Protopius calls it Casarea Panie. Hogdippus calls it Parnium, faith Wessingburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy, for in Hogdippus, set out by Radus, it is written Pannum without an R: and at such time as Philip the son of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governor of Traconitis, sometime Basan: this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tiberius Caesar, he called it * Casarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis, and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neroniana, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in S. Jerom's time the Citizens remembered their former Paness, and so re-called it, with the Territory adjoining by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hem of his garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as she was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindful of Gods goodness, and no less grateful for the same, as Enstebius and Niephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as near as it could be moulded: the other made like her self, kneeling at his feet, and holding up her hands towards him. These she mounted upon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same metal, which she placed by a Fountain near her own house: both which (faith Enstebius) remained in their first perfection, even to his own time: which himself had seen, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great. But in the year after Christ 303. that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast down and defaced: setting up the like of his own in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven broken into bits: the head, body, and other parts flundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth Book and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was near the joining together of those two Rivers, which arising from the Springs of Jor and Dan, the two apparent Fountains of Jordan, in a foil exceeding fruitful and pleasant: for, as it is written, Judg. 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Son of God: whereupon it Petrus was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: under Fulch the fourth King of Jerusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth, with all that part of the World, subjected to the Turks.

up again at Pannum or Dan: whereby it is conjectured, that the first Spring of Jordan is from this Fountain called Phiala, from whence Jor and Dan receive their waters.

§. IV.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least: so often remembered by the Evangelists. This City had the honour of Christ's presence three years: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our Salvation: according to that notable Prophecy of Ejaj 9. The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, even where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich soil: of whose destruction Christ himself prophesied

* Of another Casarea (or Caesarea) called Casarea Palaestina, see hereafter in the former part of Manasse. Of Decapolis, see Agrippa in Eccl. 1. 6. c. 25.

* Josaphat in the book of the Jewish wars, c. 18. faith, that Philip the first Christ was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: under Fulch the fourth King of Jerusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth, with all that part of the World, subjected to the Turks.

up again at Pannum or Dan: whereby it is conjectured, that the first Spring of Jordan is from this Fountain called Phiala, from whence Jor and Dan receive their waters.

phesied in these words, And thou Capernaum which art lifted up unto Heaven, shall be brought down to Hell, &c. which sheweth the pride and greatness of that City: for it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some marks of this Cities magnificence in St. Jerome's time, as himself confesseth; it being then a reasonable Burgh or Town: yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Brocard, Bredenbach, and Salinas affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor Filhermens houses.

The Region of ten principal Cities, called Decapolis, or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned; and in S. Matthew, Mark and Luke also remembered; but I find no agreement between the Geographers, what proper limits it had: and so Pliny himself confesseth; for Marinus Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the Mountain Casius in Cassotis; and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phoenicia, a part of Calyryia, all Falagina, and Judea.

Pliny also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numb'reth four of them, to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotos, Raphana, then Philadelpia (which was first called Amara, faith Stephane, or as Ighels, Amara rather, because it was the chief City of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabab, before Ptole. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name.) Then Seythopolis, sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, antiently known by the name of Bethsan; for the sixth, he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Calyryia, which was also called Antioch and Solosia;) but it is Gadara in Bethsan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, near the River of Hieromax. This River Orelus takes to be the River Jaboc: which bounded Gad and Manasseh over Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromax falleth into the Sea of Galilee, between Hippus and Gersa, whereas Jaboc cutteth the same Sea between Ephraim and Phanuel. For the seventh, he nameth Hippus, or Hippion, a City so called of a Colony of Horfmen there garrison'd by Herod, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasseh over Jordan. For the eighth, Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region over Jordan, called Persea. For the ninth, Gelsa, which Josephus takes to be Gersa: and Gersa is found in Calyryia by Josephus, Hegippus, and Stephanus: but by Proton (whom Irathor follow) in Phoenicia. The tenth and last, Pliny nameth Cana, and so doth Sextonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamila, but Hegippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Bethsan over Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a Camel. But the Collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region took name, is better gathered out of Brocard, Bredenbach, and Salinas, which make them to be these; Cesarea Philippi, Sepher, Chorazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Seythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein, and give no reason for their opinion.

One place of the Region called S. Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolis, was all that Tract between Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed again from the coast of Tyros and Zidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coast of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phoenician Sea, between Zidon and Pholomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountains Trachones, otherwise Hermos, Sanir, and Galad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, near the same distance, which may be each way forty English miles.

I. V.

Of Hamath.

BUT to look back again towards Libanus, there is seated near the foot thereof the City of * Hamath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Country adjoining taketh name: the same which Josephus callith Amathitis, and Amathosis: a Jacobus Amathitis, Zeiglor, Imura, Imura Regio tent borealis tribus Jerome, Nephtali per montem Libanum usque Trachones. The Country of Imura, faith he, containeth the Amath: North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Hamath: Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis, Imura, he maketh the fear of this Region: and doth Morator. For indeed were Imura (which Hegippus calls Persea, and G. Tyrus, Baccar) the same with Trachonitis, yet Trachonitis it self is far more to the East than Hamath in Nephtalim: for Trachonitis lieth between Cesarea Philippi, and the Mountains Trachones: which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hamath or Chammath is seated under Cesarea, towards the Sea Westward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Calyryia, beyond the Mountains Trachones, which is known upon Amos as calls Antiochia, with Hamath or Hamath the lesser also for in Phoenicia, and Nephtalim, which he callith Epiphania, (and not that which is commonly called Emath), which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Saba) is remembered in Numb. 34. 8. and Numb. 13. 22. and in Ezek. 47. 16. old be- In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of long- Promissie, these being the words: From Mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) until it come to Hamath: In the second place thus: So they shall go up, and search out the Land from the Wilderness that is, of Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath: Then in Ezekiel; The West part also shall be the great Sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath: that is, the coast of the Sea shall be the West border from the Southernmost part of the Holy Land, till you come directly over against Hamath Northward: from 6 So Jerom in his Comment on Amos 6. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seems by distinction from the other in Nephtalim, though Mat. Berolus, rejecting Hamath a follower of the opinion of Zeiglor, above mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, holdeth that the same City also called Chammath (whence the word Hamath and Emath were formed) was gathered together because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chammath-Tyber, as this (as it may seem by Isa. 21. 32) was because Numb. 34. 8. and also Ezek. 47. 10. Chammath in the North side of the Holy Land is placed too near the West corner, so that Chammath-Tyber is the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Misroto name near a place Eastward along all the breadth of the Holy Land until we come to Hermos (for so they expound Mount Her, Hermon 34. 7.) and beyond Hermos Eastward in this North-side, they make him to name directus Tovus, but Chammath, then Tiberias, then Zephon, and lastly, Chasfar-banan, a thing most unlikely: seeing we must needs expound Her to be one of the Hills near Saba, and so those Towns as they are named, to lie in order on the North-side of Epiphania, Nephtalim, and Manasser: and in like manner those in Ezekiel, first Chelion, then Chammath, and so to Chasfar-banan, Sitram, Tiberias, Chasfar-banan.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phenicia.

SECT. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and the Name of this Kingdom: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five Tribes, of Asher, Nephthim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasse, possessed the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phenicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many Volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates, and Conquest of Heathen Princes have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

Strab. 16.
Bede de
As. l. 2.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Cassotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orbistis, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orbistis, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the River of Chorfeus: which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Magedda. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppa within it: Cosimnus and Budeus, Joppa and Gaza. Phenicia apud Græcos appellatur (saith Budeus) que nunc Palestina Syria dicitur: It was called Phenicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Country of Phenicia all the Sea-side of Judea, and Palestina, even unto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Calystrya, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldom deceived in his own art. It had in it, these famous Maritime Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orbistis, Tripolis, Berytus, Beylus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomæus (or Aceus) Dora, and Casaria Palestina: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it antiently commanded the Trades of the Eastern World: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The antient Regal Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first Son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing even unto Josias's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region: afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandalic wars. But in process of time the City of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificient: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled.

Esaj. 23.

But after the death of Moser, and while Josias yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, careeneth with his Sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cadmus and Carinus) and built and possessed the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyre, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his Sister Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had taken her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia: and finds Cadmus his Successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

Hic Regina gravi gemmis auroque poscitur, Implicitæ, nono patrem: quam Belus & omnes
A Belus, soliti.

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl (Weighty with precious stones and maffe

To flow with Wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-Father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Antecesor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter-Belus, the Son of Neptune by Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Son Thebanus, according to Enchiridion: yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops's time, saith St. Augustine, Moses left Egypt: Agenor's successor living at once with Josias. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny; but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Son. But instead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of

of Letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of learning in Moses's time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to have his own Territory: or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Hebrews, who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by Josias conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanite Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male Children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerful Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Mobites, Amorites, and Ammonites their borders: yet Egypt having such Vessels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare: and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistines, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was faine to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josias, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josias called the strong City Aceus, afterward Ptolomæus, Acebus, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those days.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not make them, but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it self thirteen years against a King of Kings, Nebuchodonosor: for that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God (seemed unresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josaphat, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the Son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Calistobene derive it, ab arbore castylorum; and the Grecs from the word Phœnix, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts: yet for my self, I take it that Phœnix the Son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his Son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterward professed, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinity and Philosophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all: neither do they allow that Agenor and his Sons were Africans: whence Linus, Phœnicians first (if time may credit have)

In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the Son of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno: when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phœnician.

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum? nam Cadmus Athen. 1.
est ipse Disput.
Phœnix: cui debet Græcia dolla libros.

If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was he: to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very antient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josaphat the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Therians again subscribe to none of these reports: but affirm constantly, that the great Zoroaster flourished among them: when Atlas lived in Mauritania: Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt: and Oebus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French do not blithly to maintain, that the antient Gauls taught the Greeks the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardos and Druides are as antient as those Gauls, and that they lent their Sons hither to be by them instructed in all kind of learning?

Lastly, whereas others below this invention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all: for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourish'd most, both in Egypt and Affrica, and he himself was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the general Flood: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the others: as well in this as in many other knowledges: for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Books after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, antiently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans, a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutcheons, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations: Jura naturalia communia, Imperialia, &c. Natural Laws are common, and general.

SECT. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUT whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the Books of Zeno, Sachmetius, Masius, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josaphat, and Theophilus Antiochensis.

Agenor lived at once with Josias, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appear: but as such time as the Grecians belieged Tyre, Phœnix governed Phœnicia.

In Jerome time, and while Josaphat reigned in Judea, the Tyrans had a King apart: for Jerome speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of several Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tartan-nius ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes's fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300 Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persians: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Jerusalem time, they were subjected by Nebuchodonosor of whose conquests in the Chapter before mentioned, Jerome hath prophesied.

Tenax, though not immediately, succeeded Tartan-nius, remembered by D. Soterus in his fourteenth Book.

Serata, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Perus, and that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Greeks. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tenax and Serata. For there were confuted 130 years and some what more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this Man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Cæsar) he rather submitted himself by the instigation of his Subjects (who forsook their utter need by reliance) than that he had any disposition thereto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Lit. 4.

Abes. l. 12. c. 13.

Hieron. l. 1. c. 3. v. 10.

Of this Serata, Abelanus, out of Thompson reporteth, that he was a Man of ill living, and most voluptuous: also that he appointed certain Games and Divertor Women-Dancers, and Singers, who he to this end chiefly invited, and attended: that having beheld the most beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Serata King of that coast, St. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were near him with an Army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himself, but fainting in the execution, his Wife being present, wrested the Sword out of his hand, and flew him: which done, she also therewith pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was possessor of Zidon, and the other Stream driven thence he gave the Kingdom to Hephæstion to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompense him therewith: and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen, no less valiant than rich, desired Hephæstion that this honour might be conferred on someone of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and preferred unto him Edomianus, whom Cæsar calls Abdaminus, Jurine, Abdaminus, and Platarch, Alynnus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: though otherwise a wife Man, and excelling just.

There were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterwards changed into Populæ or Aristocracies, and by times and years subjected to the Emperors of the East, there remained no further memory of them, than that which is tornally delivered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings set Tyre: who they were before Sammels time, it doth not appear: Josaphat the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Josaphat and Theophilus Autiochensis, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars. Abibulus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josaphat and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abonulus: the same perchance that the Son of Sorab mentioned in his forty and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibulus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibulus. David (saith Eusebius out of Euphronius) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 137.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Josaphat calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hirmonius, sometimes Hieromus, but Laticus and Zonarus, Chiram. He entered into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Malons and Carpenters, to perform his buildings in Jerusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The Leve was he that so greatly afflicted Solomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great sums of Money, but also he joined with him in his conquests of the East Indies, and of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with Marbles and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 Talents of Gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josaphat in his Antiquities, and in 2 Sam. 8. c. 18. in Theophilus his third book, c. 1. Plinius in his Oratio against the Greeks: and in Zonarus. Tome the first. This Prince seemeth to be a very mighty and magnificent, he depopled the twenty Towns which Solomon offered him: he depopled himself against that victorious King David: and gave his Daughter in marriage to Solomon, called Zebedee: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astarte, the Idol of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53 years.

Balestarius, whom Thop. Antiochensis calleth Bazarmus, succeeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 16 years, according to Josaphat.

Abdasturus the eldest Son of Balestarius, governed nine years, and lived but twenty years, according to Josaphat: but after Theophilus, he reigned twelve years, and lived 54 who being slain by the four Sons of his own Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdom twelve years.

Arturus Brother to Abdasturus, recovered the Kingdom from this usurper, and reigned twelve years.

Artimus, or Abartimus, after Theophilus, a third Brother, followed Arturus, and ruled nine years and lived in all fifty four.

Phelet the fourth Son of Balestarius, and Brother to the three former Kings, slew Artimus, and reigned eight Months, and lived fifty years.

Abobalus (or Josabobalus, in Theophilus) Son to the third Brother Artimus, who was the chief Priest of the Cothels Astarte, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his Father and slaughtered his Uncle Phelet: and reigned thirty two years: the time which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Eubasan, whose Daughter Jezebel Abas married.

Bazzer, or Bazzer, the Son of Abobalus, or Eubasan, Brother to Jezebel, succeeded his Father and reigned six years, and lived in all forty five.

Matimus succeeded Bazzer, and reigned but nine years (saith Josaphat) he had two Sons, Pyzgemon lion, and Berez, and two Daughters, Elisa and Anna.

Pyzgemon reigned after Matimus his Father forty Years, and lived fifty six. In the seventh Year of whose reign, Elisa failed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143 Years and eight Months after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289 Years after Iroy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pyzgemon covetous of Sidon his sister, who had married his Sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe Josaphat and Virgil: at the Altar, wherupon Pyzgemon was to be disposed of: her Husband Treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pyzgemon prepared to pursue, he was by his Mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Berez accompanied his Sister, and assisted her in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Berez in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captains, and the great Annibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Phœnix, because of her man-like acts: other from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon.

Eldem succeeded Pyzgemon, and reigned thirty six Years: the time that overthrew the Fleet of Salmassar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five Years, but in vain.

After Eldem, Eubabulus governed the Tyrians, who vaulted himself to be as wife as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Eusebius) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his twenty eighth Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nebuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre thirteen Years together, ere he prevailed.

But followed Eubabulus, and reigned ten Years tributary, perchance, to Nebuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First by Eenabulus, then by Chelbi, Abarn the Priest, Mitonus, and Georgius, who held it among them some eleven Years, and odd Months: after whom Balaturus commanded therein as a King for one Year: after him Mibalus sent from Babylon, four Years: after him Irom, sent thence also, twenty Years. In the fiftieth of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

SECT. III.

Of Babus his conceit, that the Edomians inhabiting along by the Red Sea, were the Predecessors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Babus that hath writtens a Treatise against the Dei veris Gentium. And although the large and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under Heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable and the same for ever: yet whereas the said Babus, enforcing hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion: to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edomians, descended from Elsan, Jacob Brother: this, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end (besides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hierons good affection, when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectural arguments: whereto the fittonest of their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Elsan received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edomians, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authorities. For Sirabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others, witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea in which there were three Islands, called Tyre, Arad, and Zidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edomians: as Elis and Esfungab were under the Amalekites who descended of Amalek the Nephew of Elsan, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Madian the Son of Abraham by Cathura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the Children of Israel. Hieronymus adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astarte, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherocles being Phœnicians, the themselves did much to their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Greeks. That in Tonua, a Town of the Edomians, was a University, whereto, as may appear by Eliphas the Tennitic, who disputed with Job, Religion was inaccurately taught.

Such is the discourse of Babus, who labouring to prove one Paradox of authors, defects in both very little credit. For, neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edomians, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edomians at all. In what Religion Elsan brought up his Children, it is no where found writtens: but that himself was a profane Man, and disapproved by God, the Scriptures in plain terms express. That his Posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the twenty fifth Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the House of Israel, live only when David and some of his race, Kings of Judah, held them in subjection, who knowest? or who is ignorant of David his unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when last they were subdued? surely, it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance between Tyre and Mount Sin, that Hiram held such good concordance with David, even then when Job slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edomites were so ill treated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphas the Tennitic was then forgotten, and the Edomians punished, for being such as David in his own days found them. Although indeed the City of Tonua whence Eliphas came to reason with Job, is not that in Edomes, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Gallilee, and adjoining to Hur, the country of Job: and to Sueb the City of Bildad the Sabite as both such Chorographers who befit ken those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wisdom all the People of the East: not the Inhabitants of Mount Sin, which lay due

p. 1. c. 7.

due South from P'elima. True it is, that Elphaz, the Son of Efa had a Son called Teman; but that Fathers were wont in those days to take name of their Sons, Ino where hind. And Ismael also had a Son called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seventh Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battle to the Host of Israel, wherein were 60000 able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Efa's grand-children. For how powerful and numberless must the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Sad went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it self, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being Son to Abraham by Ceturah, doubtless was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seignior of the Red Sea coast, which Bozias imagines the Phoenicians to have held: it the Edomites in after-times held some places, as Elan and Esfongabar on the Red Sea shore; yet in Mose's time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Mose himself saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian lived. Mose must needs have known it: because he had journeyed long in that Country; and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable soever, are needless in so manifest a case. For in the 83 Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrans and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozias himself confesseth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15, and 19, appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the Children of Assur, Jof. 29, because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed Seed of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same faith. For though Hiram said Isidore be God that hath sent King David a wife Son: we cannot infer that he was of David's Religion. The Turks hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astarte and drew Solomon also to their Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which which Tubus was, and yet is over petted, being otherwise apt to yield Silks: as the Audians Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities. For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. All Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wisest, who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrans was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which enforced Tyrans to hold league with Israel. For David had subdued Moba, Ammon, Edom, the Amorites, and a great part of Arabia, even to the Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrans were wont to carry and recarry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyrus: so that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to pass, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Ismaelites were no Sea-men, therefore glad to share with the Tyrans in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrans, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant, as a Man of peace, to employ his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of piety in the Tyrans: so those other proofs which Bozias frames negatively upon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no Man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours: which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Tholer and Phereides are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excelleth the Vulgar, even of civil people. Neither did the moral wisdom of these Men express any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Tholer being Tyrans, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrans were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Vicia, Lepis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrans (of which, I think, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrans who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomon's time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozias, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is so preposterous, that he filleth Men of contrary opinion. Imperio Politico, as if it were impious to think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded moral honesty, with temporal happiness. Doubtless, this doctrine of Bozias would better have agreed with Julian the Apollate, than with Cyril. For if the Affians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentile, did then prosper most, when they drew nearest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foul Idolatry, which grew in Rome as tall as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great Battles did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new honour to one of their old Gods? Yea, what one Nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers set against the Christians in the Primitive Church? That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations nations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a sign or effect of true Religion. Such is the blind zeal of Bozias, writing against those whom he fallily terms impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indifference is usually found among Men of his humours: who having once either foolishly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly fathomed in their own brains any strange Chimeras of Divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like impetuous ignorance. Great pity it is, that such mad Dogs are oftentimes encouraged by their, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a Man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious virtue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

SECT. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now past over Phoenicia we come to the next Territory adjoining, which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second Son of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000, all which dying in the Deserts, (Isaiah excepted) there entered the Holy Land of their Children grown to be able Men, 32500 who fate down on the West side of Jordan: between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South: as Jordan on the Mediterranean Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Anur or Homri King thereof and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Schelex, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Caesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificence it was in the first building; for as Brocard observeth, the ruins which yet remain, and which Brocard found greater than those of Jerusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great force of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewn and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sons of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the Son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Schelex. Herein were the Prophets Hilfies and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Near Samaria, towards the South, is the hill of Beisel, and a Town of that name: on the top of which Mountain Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Ismaelites.

In light of this Mountain of Beisel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napajafa: It was destroyed by Simon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their Sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec evened with the Soil. Jeroboam raised it up again: and the Damascenes a third time cut it down.

Upon Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pharathon, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Jedai, Abdon Judge of Israel. And under it Beithoron of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Near to this City Judas Machabeus overthrew Saron and Lyfias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Beithoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Jof. 10, and Saron, whose King was slain by Jofias: it is also mentioned Abd. 9. 35, and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestina, extendeth it self along the coast as far as Joppe, saith Adrichom: though indeed the name Saron is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitful plain Region: for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, between Cesarea and Joppe; but that also between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Gallilee: for so St. Jeron upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esaie, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries upon Abdias, read Saron for Affaron: understanding thereby a Plain near Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diospolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judea, the fifth in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where St. Peter (nomen, sed Christi virtute) cured Aeneas. Niger calls all that Region from Antipatania to Joppe, Saron. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, whose Ravens and spoils of all Estates, disturbers of Common-wealths, usurpers of other Princes Kingdoms: who with no other respect led, than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole World: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most savage and barbarous Nations.

In Diospolis (saith William of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Justinian the Emperor caused a fair Church to be built over his Tomb; where Ephraim's words: Re-lilla d'acris loci maritima Antipatride, & Joppe, pelate patetum planitum Elubarian perianthante, Lid. 1. 3. dam, que est Diospolis, ubi et egregii Maritimi Georgii

relinquendo Sepulchrum obdolum, porrocorum, quæ Eodem quædam ad hanc quædam Moxie, pium & ardentem Principem Romanorum. Augustus Iulianum multo fuerit & deinde pempta, adfectori preceptor, &c.
The living life (faith he) on the right hand, the Sea
Theris, Antipatris and Joyce, pitting over the great open Flainet, Lucheria, came to Lidda, which is Diopolis: above the Lucheria Tomb of the famous Martyr St. George it is said is buried: whose Church, when the gully and Orthodox Prince of the Common, High and mighty Iulianus, had commanded to be built, with great earnestness and present devotion, &c. This in Ierusalem by whose testimony we may conjecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this S. Alexandria was slain there in an uproar of the people, and his ashes came into the Sea, as dominicus Macchabæus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian than he is commonly thought to: for his words of the Temple of Genus, How long shall this Sepulchre stand?
tupples the uprose of the people against him: as fearing lest he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful Temple. This also Macchabæus reports who though he say that this Georgius was also dead handed of the Christians, who life might have reduced him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest it their Reliques had been gathered up, Churches should be built from them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not Georgius, whose name lives in the right honourable order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Irenæus avowed wineth to have been buried at Lidda or Dis-polis. The same also is confirmed by Vitruvius, S. Jeron affirms that it was sometime called Tigris, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Near to Lidda or Diopolis standeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Amaleth: afterward Rama, and Ramada, the native City of Joseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which bear this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda near Uzer in the way of Hebron; another in Sephora-tim, not far from Sephor; a third in Zebulun, which they say, adjoined to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which they Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sephim,
1 Sam. 25. where Sammel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North along the coast are Helon, or Asalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. 6. A-polonia, of which Josephus in his Antiquities, and in the Wars of the Jews. Also Balsatha for which Judith, 2 Reg. 4. 42. reads plantier Shalite; they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Irenæus upon 1 Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Balsatha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other side of the Mountains of Ephraim standeth Gofat, one of the Toparchies, or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thannath-Garab, or according to the Hebrews, Thinnath-Sarab: one also of the ten Toparchies, or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thannath-Sarab, or according to the Hebrews,
Thinnath-Sarab: one also of the ten Toparchies, or Profectores of Judea, which they call Thinnathia, a greatly City, and strong, situated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim on the North of the Hill called Gias; which City and Territory Iffad gave unto their Leader Phisari; who also amplified it with buildings, near which he was buried. His Sepulchre was therein, repaired in S. Jeron's time, and over it the San-cgraven, in memory of that great of wonders, which God wrought in Joshua's time.

In the places adjoining standeth Alifsa, or Alifsa, where Judas Machabæus with three thousand Jews overthrew the Army of Nicæus, Lieutenant of Syria; near to Gofat, or Gezor, which Joshua took, and hung their King; a City of the Levites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all flam, and the City razed; Solomon rebuilt it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Jufa, of which Jos. 16. 3. otherwise Pethai, whence David had part of his Pretorian Soldiers, under the charge of Benai. Then that high and famous Mount of Sion, and City of Silo, whereto the Ark of God was hept for many years, till the Philistines got it.

To this they join the City of Mubon, or Miclon;
in which Jonathan Machabæus inhabited, a place of common way from Samaria towards Jerusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Niab where Sammel proph-etized; and near it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Jerobam; after the great overthrow given him. Then Kimbafim, of the Levites, of which Jos. 21. 22. which Irenæus thinks to be the same with Jerobam, of which 1 Chron. 6. 28. Asior Abilam Basifor, which they find hereabout, Judith reads it, in the Plain of Chazor; and finds it in the Tribe of Juda; as Jos. 15. we read of two Cities in that Tribe; one near Kedib, Jos. 23. and the other the same as Chazor, Jos. 25.

In this Tribe also they find the City of Millo, whose Citizens, they say, joined with the Schemites in making the Bastard Abimelech King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Solomon raised a Tribute upon the people. But it seems that * Millo, or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Citadel:
and to Irenæus, for domus Millo, reads in Latin, munition, and for Salomo edificavit Millo, herads edificavit munitionem, and for the Septuagint read it τὴν ἀσπίδα in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichen, but another in Jerusalem.

The other Cities of mark in Ephraim, are Tapher-ach, whose King was slain by Joshua's and Judas or Jacob, spoiled by Teglatphalassar; Pothah, their governing Israel, with divers others, but of no great fame. The Mountains of Ephraim sometime signify the greatest part of the Land of the Sons of Joseph, on the West of Jordan: several parts wherof are the Hill of Samon, or Samaria, 1 Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gabat, Judg. 2. 9. the Hill of Talmor, or Salomon, Judg. 9. 48. The Hills of the Region of Tiphor, or Tiphim, Judg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tiphim stood, which was the City of Samel.

The great plenty of fruitful Vines upon the sides of the Mountains, was the occasion that Jacob in the spirit of prophecy Gen. 49. 22. compared Joseph's two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading his Daughter branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezek. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prophesies: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Jacob, Gen.
49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lion. Upon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which overlooketh all the Plains on both sides of Jordan, they find the Castle called Dak; which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Jos. 1. 1. Jos.
Judg. 2. in which Castle, as Jos. 15. Pithon most traitorously at a banquet, slew Simon Machabeus his father-in-law.

Among

Among the Rivers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gas, remembered in 2 Sam. 23. 30. where though Irenæus reads, Hiddai ex uia vallium Gabati;
yet the Vulgar and Patabar read Giddai, of the River of Gas. Also in this Tribe they place the River of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was * fed with the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travelled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sion: where he was relieved by the poor widow of Zarepta, whose dead he revived, and increased her pittance of Meal and Oil: whereby the sustained her life.

SECT. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes, from Jerobam to Achab.

OF the first Kings of Israel I omit in this place to speak, and referre it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to speak. The first of these Kings Jerobam, as far as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in these works. During which time, as he went to Jerusalem, he encountered the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that he was by God destined to be King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes.
After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomon's knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shiphak, whom Ephraim calleth Ophobor, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shiphak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the E-dumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Judah, which Ad-ad the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Tapher; using both him and Jerobam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judea, that himself might the easier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Jerobam, called Jerobam's City of Jerusalem, and carried thence the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Adadzeor of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of Hamath, which were of an ineffable value.

This Jerobam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that State: yet perverting the policies of the World before the Service and Honour of God (as tending that if the Tribes under his rule should repair to Jerusalem to do their usual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, faith Saint Ambrose, or rather of Aron's Calf in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people.
He deplored the warning of the Judean Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adas, and Glycas Jud: his hand thereafter withered, and was again recovered; but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened, upon occasion that the Prophet returning, was slain by a Lyon; Abijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

He was afterward overthrown by Abis King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty years: whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second year of his reign, together with all the race of Jerobam, was slain, and rooted out by Basia, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two years.

Basia the son of Abijah, the third King after the partition, made War with Asa King of Juda: he fought himself in Thersa; and fortified Rama against Juda, to refrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entreated Benbadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nephthaim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Basia intended to fortify Rama: but being an Idolater, he was threatened by John the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam:
which afterward came to pass: He ruled four and twenty years, and died.

To Basia succeeded Elia his son, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophesie of John was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Elia, and assumed the name of a King seven days; but Amris in revenge of the Kings murder, fell upon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and forced him to burn himself.

Amris or Homri succeeded Elia, and transferred the Regal feat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemo, built, and fortified it. This Am-ris was also an Idolater no less impious than the rest:
the father of Benbadad, according to Eusebius, Niphor, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I do not well conceive: seeing Benbadad the son of Tabremmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assist Basia King of Israel, the father of Elia, who fore-went Amris. This Amris reigned twelve years, six in Thersa, and six in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

SECT. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab, or Achab succeeded Omri, who not only upheld the Idolatry of Jerobam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezabel the Zidonian:
and as Jerobam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God, God fed famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the sacrifice, and killed the false Prophets: and afterward suffered for the sake of Jezabel.

Benbadad not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him let at liberty: for which, the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joining with Jafa-phat in the War for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Michas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochobias, Joram, and Joz: besides seventy other sons by sin-dry Wives and Concubines.

Ochobias succeeded his father Achab, The Moabites Plaga, fell from his obedience: he trusted himself by a fall: faith Irenæus and sent for counsel to Belzeazar the god of Asherah, Eliab 2 Kings 12.

Eliab the Prophet meeteth the Messenger on the way: and miffiking that Obozias fought help from that dead Idol, asked the Messenger, if there were not a God in Israel? Obozias lendeth two Captains, and with each 50 Soldiers, to bring Eliab unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captain befought mercy at Eliab's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to pass in the second year of his reign.

Joram, the brother of Obozias by Jezabel, succeeded: He called Jasaphas King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moshites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000 sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Deserts. The Prophet Eliha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moshites are overthrown: their King flith to Kisbassab, and being besieged, according to some Expollitors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, wherat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Mosh, walling and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moshites, and that the King of Mosh threw him over the walls, threatening, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in Sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the King of Edom befought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yield unto, and that the Assaults might diminish it, the King of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whole alliance the siege was broken up.

After this the King of Arum sent to Joram, to heal Namaan the Captain of his Army of the Leprosy. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life, that he dare send to heal a man of his Leprosy? adding, that the Aramites fought but matter of quarrel against him. Eliha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Namaan to him: promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Namaan was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan.

Eliha refused the gifts of Namaan: but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the Sellers of spiritual gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians, of Simon Magus. Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramites conspired in his secret counsel, sent a Troop of Horse to take Eliha: all whom Eliha struck blind, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to lay them, Eliha forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefits, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Joram imputed the cause thereof to the Prophet Eliha, Eliha by prayer caused a voice of Chariots and Armour to sound in the Air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the fame is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azad obtained the Kingdom of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entering upon his frontier, took Ramoth-Gilead: in which War he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilst he lay there, Jehu (who commanding the Army of Jordan in Gilead, was anointed King, by one of the children of the Prophets, sent by Eliha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, defroyed not only the race of his Fore-goes, but also their Religion: for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jehoram, 1-45. 26. in he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which War he was slain, with Cedonius: wherout the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28 years.

Josabaz, or Jehosabaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azad and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subdued, leaving him only 50 Horse, 20 Chariots, and 10000 Foot: and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust: beaten into powder. Josabaz reigned 17 years.

After Josabaz, Jos his son governed Israel, who when he repaired to Eliha the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his brow, and bid him open the window Weitiward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows: who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had so many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Jos, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the son of Azad, which his Father Josabaz had lost. He also overthrew Azazias King of Juda, who provoked him to make the War, whereupon he entered Jerusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Jos reigned sixteen years and died: in whose time also the Prophet Eliha exchanged this life for a better.

Jerobam the third from Jehu, followed Jos his Father, an Idolater, as his predecessors: but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath, which is near Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty years.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the House of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, governed six Months. Shallum held the Kingdom but one Month, being slaughtered by Menabem of the Gadites.

Menabem, who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: 1-45. 16. 17. ridding the Bellies of those that were with Child. This Menabem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of Silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every Man of wealth in Israel. Menabem governed twenty years.

Pekahias, or Phaceia, or after Zonaras, Phaceia, succeeded, and after he had ruled two years, he was slain by Phaceia, or Pekab the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekab's time, Phul, or Tiglat-Phalsar invaded the Kingdom of Israel, and won Ton, Abel-Berachiah, Jamach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Gad, Issachar, carrying them captives into Affria: he was drawn in by Azaz King of Judea, against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Azaz being waded by Pekab of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith, ingaged the Affrian, who had suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inviting of the great Affrian, was the utter ruin of both States, of Israel, and of Judea. Pekab reigned twenty Years.

Then Hofea, or Ofa, who slew Pekab, became the vassal of Salmassars, but hoping to shake off the Affrian yoke, he sought aid from So, or Sua, or Sobus King of Egypt: which being known to the Affrian, he call him into prison, besieged Samaria, and matted it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Nineve in Affria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them: and re-planted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthes, (inhabiting about Cutha, a City in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanai bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sopharajim (a people of Sophar in Mesopotamia) also with those of Aza, which were of the ancient Assirs, who inhabited the Land of the Philistines in Abrahams time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Catharims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Hamei, willing to return to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chathab, or Hamea, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which lo often afflicted them. And thus did this Affrian advise himself better than the Romans did. For after Tam and Isophad had wasted the Cities of Judea and Jerusalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their own thin Garrisons, which soon decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabs and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displacement, happened in the year of the World, 3292 the sixth year of Ezekiab King of Juda: and the ninth of Hofea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasse.

SECT. I.

Of Dan, wherof Jappe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOW following the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, wherof I spake last: of which Family there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700 fighting Men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Sons 66400, bearing arms. The first famous City in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Jappe, or Joppa, as in the 19 of Josua: one of the most ancient of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Jerusalem. From hence Joram embarked himself when he fled from the service of God towards Tharbis in Gilead. In the time of the Mechabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Mechabees governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garrison'd in Jappe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 260 principal Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape, to the Sword.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Cyprian the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ, 1250 Lodowick the French King gave it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster, by Perseus. This fable (for I take it) confirmed by Jesephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus L. 4. 3. 12. Scamur during his office of Archbishop, shewed the Andromeda this Monster to the People of Rome. S. Jeron. lib. 1. 5. cap. 9. upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Jappe was Jamnia, where Judas Mechabees burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame wherof was seen at Jerusalem, 240 furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishop's seat, faith Will. of Tyre: but there is no sign of it at this time, that such a place there was.

After Jamnia is the City of Geth, or Gath, sometime Anthon, faith Volaterran, and Jo Montanus seems to understrand it. For he sets it next to Egypt. F. 115.

of all the Philistin Cities, and in the place of Antidon. But Volaterran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Psalm sets Antidon far to the South of Joppa: and Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistines: and about sixteen miles from Joppa: where St. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anaksims, strong and Giant-like Men, whom Jofas could not expel, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Israhelites. David time: who drove Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferior in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Robam the Son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the Son of Azaziel destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azaziel King of Syria. Fully the fourth King of Jerusalem, built a Cattle in the same place out of the old ruins. Whether this Geth was the same that Wif, of Tyre in the Holy War calls Isidun, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Antidon.

Not far from Geth or Gath standeth Bethfomez, or the House of the Sun. In the Fields adjoining to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a voice of two Kings, turned loose by the Philistines: and the Bethfomer presuming to look therein, there were slain of the Elders 70 and of the people 50 thousand, by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great A-bet, faith St. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus finds three other Cities of this name: one in * Nephthali: another in Juda: and another in Issachar. Hierome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Acaron offereth it self, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistines. St. Hierome makes it the same with Cefaria Palastina. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it self against the Danites and Idumeans. It worshipped Bel-zebub, the God of Hornets or Flies. To which Idol was that Abimelech King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Elisab meeting by the way, caused them to return with a powerful answer to their Master. This City is mentioned in many places of Scripture.

Corinthian Scholts place Azotus next to Geth, and then Acaron or Ekeon. This Azotus or Afod, was also an habitation of the Anaksims, whom Jofas & David destroyed, though he once possessed their City. Heron flood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the Idol Dagon: the same Idol which fell twice to the ground of it self, after the Ark of God was by the Philistines carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Near it was that famous * Judas Macchabeus slain by Bacchides and Antiochus, the Lieutenants of Dometrian. Afterward it was taken by Timotheus: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the Sword, all that fell into to the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idols therein consumed with Fire: next which also he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Bishops Seat while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in St. Hierome time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Ashphoth, wherein Philip the Apostle baptized the Eunuch, are Ticath, Samaria, and Ephraim, and between them Cafar Dan near Habonim: though this place where Samson was born, may seem by the words, Judas,

18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judah, as the other also were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda. After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor, or Asotus 1. Mos. 15. Gedron, which Condeus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jews, and near which, himself was by the Macchabees overthrown.

Then Medin the Native City of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height, as they served for a mark to Sea-Men, remained many hundreds of years after their burial setting up, as Boschard and Broderick write of it.

There are besides these the City of Carithiarum, that is, the City of the woods: & rated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained 20 years in the House of Amindado: till such time as David carried it thence to Jerusalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the Son of Berachias, or Johannas, who was slain between the Temple and the Altar: also Urias, whom Josiah King of Jerusalem slaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe rather, as I take it, upon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Cafin taken with great slaughter by Judas Macchabeus: and Lebith, whose King was slain by Judas, in which also Amziab was slain: The same which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Jofas c. 19. from the 29. 41. where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore they invaded Lebanon, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the Brother of Heraclitus, was called Cefaria Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Iturea, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this City see more in Nephthali. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Northern-most rifest out of the Mountains of Juda: and passing by Medin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the names of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentiful of Vines which have no Seeds or Rosts: the Wine they yield is Red, of excellent colour, taste, and favour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, lo called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Samson loved.

SECT. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

THE Tribe of Simon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second Son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as * and they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 59300 able Men, thereof all which ending their lives in the Deserts, there entered the Land of Promise of the issues 22200 bearing arms, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast belonging to Edom, of which the first City adjoining to Dan, was Afcalon.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Afcalonites: of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in Tribe fe the History of the Lydians, reports, that Cantax King of Afcalon were the Sons of Hymeneus: and that Afcalon being employed by Azaziel King of the Lydians, and with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own name: The same hath Nicolas in his History, faith Volaterran.

Diodorus

Diodorus Siculus in his third Book remembereth a Lake near Afcalon, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Deceba, the Goddesses of the Syrians having the Face of a Woman, and the Body of a Fish: who as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palatium sancta Columba Syra.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palatine.

It was one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of the Philistines. It bred many learned Men (faith Volaterran, as Antiochus, Sofus, Cyzanus, Dorastus the Historian, and Antiochus, who wrote the story of Egyptus).

In Afcalon, as some say, was that wicked Heraclitus born, that kicking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-Children of two years old and under to be slain. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Salandine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made War in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall and many buildings. Ejus murus cum Saladinis diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex inauravit, faith Adrichomius.

In David time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistines: for he nameth Gath and Afcalon every now, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathas: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it in the Streets of Afcalon: It is now called Sealeon. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Afcalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazer, the Syrians, Azan, of Azan (as they say) the Son of Heraclitus. Other profane Writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter, Pompey Melas gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian: because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much as to say, as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistines, and the South border of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Calab: but the strength of the Anaksims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long Siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desert.

Alexander Janeus King of the Jews surprised it and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Asaph, which he did thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not let up in the same place again, to wit, on the Foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea-side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was lost by Simon: of which he made so great account, as that he purposed to ride there himself and in his absence left John his Son and Succellor, to be Governor. In Brochard his time it was full a goodly City, and known by the name of Gaza.

At the very out-let of the River of Esfor, standeth Majma the Port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a City was given by the great Constantine, and the place called Confiance, after the name of the Emperours Son. But Julian the Apollata soon after favouring the Gazans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

On the other side of Esfor standeth Antidon, Jof 15. in defaced by Alexander Janeus, restored by Heraclitus, and called Agrippia, after the name of Agrippa, the favorite of Augustus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Jof 15. is known in the Scriptures by the name of * the Tower of Egypt, till the Sepharim converted it to Tharcon: to difference it, Ej 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Tower that watcheth it. Calis Phly calls it Rhinocura: and Josphus Rhinocura: Ej 4. Eph 4. Epiphanius reports it as Tradition, that at this place the stream of the World was divided by lot between the three Sons of Noah.

Within the Land, and upon the River of Esfor they place Gozar: which the Scripture placeth between Radph and Shur, Gen 20. 1. That it was near to the Wilderness of Beerseba, it appears Gen 20. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elsewhere Beerseba, so Eph 4. Epiphanius reports it as Tradition, that at this place the stream of the World was divided by lot between the three Sons of Noah.

More within the Land was Sicleg, or Yfleg, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David his flying from Saul to the Philistines had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Esfor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir, sometime Carinab-Sepher, a City of Jof 15. Letters, the University, as they say, or Academy of Yfleg. Old Palestine in St. Hierome's time, it seems, it had the name of Danna: Jof 15. 49. it is called Urbs Samue: from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anaksims: as Hierome was called Urbs Arabi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Ohonias, incouraged by Calab promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Jofas and the Host of Israel were at the surprize, it appears, Jof 10. Jof 11. 39. This City Jof 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simon, but of less fame, as Hajin, of which Jof 15. 7. which also Jof 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simon, (for which Junius thinks Hajin is named Chiron, 6. 59. though * in the place of Jofas, these two are differing) also Tholad, fo named 1 Chron 4. 29. for which Jof 19. 4. we have Ethelad, Chazar-Sufa, fo named, Jof 19. 5. ita which Jof 15. we have Chazar-Gad, the names agreeing in signification: for Gad is Turme, and Sufa, Egyptus.

In the same places of Jofas and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the same with that of which Nam 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purified the Israhelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simon, nor within the Mountains of Edumaea. For Israel Red not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Desert.

The same places also name Beerseba in this Tribe; so called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelech, near unto which Hagar wandred with her Son Ismael. It was also called the City of Isaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Chorathim held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this been taken at first from Nabab's, the Son of Abraham by Ketura. For Nabab's is no where understood for all Arabia Petraea (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judaea. For Phoenicia inhabited by Israel, whose people Phoenicians called Phoenicians, instead of Israelites, and all those Territories of the Casiter, Medianites, Amalekites, Ishmaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hur, Sin, and of Og King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ishmaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles, the fifth, calls Hagarites of Hagar.

This City Petra, Scamoz befieged with the Roman Army, and hiding the place in these impregnable, was content by the perfavation of Antipater, to take a composition of money, and to quit it. Yet Amman King of Jela (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the Valley called Sallinaram) was also this City. Sc. Hierime finds Ruth the Moabitess to be natural of this City. In the mean time, when the Assyrians held the Kingdom of Jerusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is located not far from Hur, where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the River Zered, or Zered, by which Mojer encamped in the 5th Station. Adrichomius describeth the Waters of Morrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zered and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Sare: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Sare also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Adrichomius returned from the pursuit of the Affian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Sare, or Sareh, which is the Kings Dale, where Absalom set up his Monument, as it is called, not far from Jerusalem. And at the same time Melchisedek King of Salem also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedek inhabiting, either near Bethsan, or otherwise Sythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Jerusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Sare, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

II. IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

Now because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, is called also the Lake Asphaltitis, and the Salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh Water) also the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea of the Plains, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no outlet, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes a hundred eighty furlongs (which makes 22 miles and a half of ours) and about 15 in breadth, which make 180 of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal less: but those that have of late years been in this Sea, did account it (faith *Wesselingh) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length, and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immeris ambitus, speciei maris, sapore corruptior, gravitate odoris acutior: neque vento impellitur, neque posset aut fuit aqua volucres patitur, incertum unde superjacet aut fuita feruntur, perit, imperitque nandi pericula: attoluntur, &c. That is, it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of itself infectious, and perilous to the borders: it is neither moved nor assailed by the Wind, nor indurably fit to live in it, as wont to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, are born up by the Water, as well as the skillful, are born up by the Water. At one time of the year callest it out Bimmon: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like business.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: *The fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning: of which the ruins remain, the ground looking with a sad face, at having left her fruitfulness: for whatsoever dabbeth either grain, or is fit thereon, or flowers, when they come to ripeness, bearing nothing within them, but moulder into after: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples or Oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dunt within. Of the Bimmon which this Lake callest up, it was by the Greeks called Apollinith. Josephus deliques to be fatistied of these reports went on purpose to fetch this Lake, and cauled certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskillful in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.*

II. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon, Reuben posselt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben posselt (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21. of Num. v. 14. nameth Vabeh, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the Son of Zippor: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moab by arms, by the examples of Sehon, and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaams curstings or incantments, to take from them all their strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first moved by the spirit of God blest Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfy him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to seduce Moabitish women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen, but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsel, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saving that we find in the first of Chronicles, the fourth, that Jobab and the Men of Chozabai, and Joab, and Sareph, all being of the Issue of Moab, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, The Moabites are as things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these Mens governments are no where extant or remaining, or as others, hac prius fuisse, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their their posterity choose rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we find Egion King of Moab, who with the help of Ammon and Amalec maltreated Israel, and commanded them eighteen years: which Egion, Ehad lived in his own house, and afterwards a 1000 of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had, unto whom David fled, fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the same again whom Saul made War, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul he received David, and relieved him: knowing that Saul sought his life.

After this, David himself entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning, that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Edomites.

The next King after Davids time of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mefha, who falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fastened himself to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab, 100000 Lambs, and 200000 Rams with the Wool: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jebooram, with whom joined the Kings of Juda and Idumea: and being by these three Kings preit and broken, he fled to Kir-barshai, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumeans, invaded Josephaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set on the Idumeans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Josephaphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieromy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mefha of Moab many descents: for Mefha lived with Jebooram, and this Moabite in Zedekia's time, 14 Kings of Juda coming between, who walked three hundred and odd years.

SECT. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joynted to the Ammonitains, was sometime in the possession of the Children of Gad, the seventh Son of Jacob by Zepha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Zepha, and died in the Desart, 455 years and of their Sons there entered the Land promised, 45000 bearing Arms: for the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jacob divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Harbon, Elisele, and Aphe.

The chief City of Gad was Arzor, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moser, Dou. 2. 36. Ab Haribor, qui est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & civitate ipsa quae est in flumine: Where the City in the river is distinguished from the City upon the bank of the River, as also in like manner, (Jof. c. 12. v. 2.

and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Haribor, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeed erected near Hur of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Hur was never posselt by Moser, it is plain Duteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moser to do it, faith, he hath given Hur for an inheritance to the Sons of Lu. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haribor, which is said in the same place to be on the bank of the Arnon) is Hur of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numb. chapt. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Hur is located: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jof. 13. ver. 25. where Haribor is said to be located before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they felt not Haribor near it, nor in flight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here, we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Hur: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harbon. And as for *Hur, (which also gave the name to the coast adjoining) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, but first weakened by Chedorlammur and his Associates: but Haribor by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Yephia by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites under the conduct of Yephia.

In Sc. Hieromy time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zor, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence: which they say was therefore called Pitula 15. confessorum, because as was wonten tumbling heifer, the war was overthrow with earth-quake, for which cause also Arnon seems to think that this Zor was called Salifa, or Bal-Salifa, as if Bal had been the remainder of the old name Balab, or Balab, (of which Gen. 14. 2.) and Salifa, which hath a signification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three Earth-quake.

Brocard takes Haribor to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted: seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoining to Edom, whereas Haribor is in the North-East border. Between Haribor and Jerusalem they say Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to have built it, Numb. 32. 34. though Jof. 13. v. 17. it is said that Moser gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the rest of Moab, both Efay and Jeremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village near Arnon in Sc. Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Arzor, was Bethnimrah, of which Efay prophesied, That the waters thereof should be dried up, all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrah in this Tribe, Adrichomius placeth Yogbeah and Nobach, or Nibeh: but both which were in the story of Gidon: and that Yogbeah was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears Numbers 22. 35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts: but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moser witnesseth. Nobach also (faith he) went and took Kenath with her Town, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Verbes precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moser would have levered this seat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 24. 25. 36. therefore it may seem that

* Num. 21. this Nabab was in that part of Manassé: which was in the East of Jordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he supposeth it to be the same with Nab, which Saul destroyed, of which we shall speak in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkar, where Zebah and Zalmunbar rellted themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nabab and Jogbeba, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kirchar, of which Ely 15. and 2 Rege 3. 75. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and it is the same with Kirchar, it is certain, and that it was still a principal City held by the Mozabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hatathoth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were built by the Gadites: the former simply called Hatathoth, the later Hatathoth-Sophan: for which latter the vulgar makes two Cities; Roib and Stophan: the name Hatathoth is as much as Corona.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Behnaim of which we have spoken, Jof 13. 27. nameth Behb-haram and Seonoth: the latter, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Behb-haram) together with Behnaim, is said to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Jofia it is called Behb-haram) some take to be Beharaphis, of which Jof 13. 27. after by Herod called Jubas. But whether this Beharaphis were corrupted from Behb-haram, or from Behb-Aramutha (of which Aramutha there is mention in * Jof 13. 27. or from Behb-romphan (of which Romphan, an Idol of those Countries, we read, Alti 7. 43. and to which Junius returns the name of the City Rephan, 1 Mae 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve.

But touching Julias (according to Jofeph some time Beharaphis, the same Jofeph placeth in the Region of Perexa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Perexa, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ultra-jordan, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to fix down the bounds of this Perexa, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Jofeph. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipater, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia.

Jofeph 2. 3. adoption his Wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption he was called Julia. Another Julias, he faith was built by Philo the Brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he faith, is the same as Behb-Gad.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Perexa, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Tobias, as it is called in Jofeph, for Behb-zeab, which is as much as domus Isepi. Of a noble Woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others into Tersulim, and was there be sieged. Jofeph in the place noted, reports a lamentable History: how for hunger the eat her own Child, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Seonoth (which we said Jof 13 is placed with Behb-haram, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, weary in the pursuit of Zebah, and Zalmunbar, he requested relief of the men of Seonoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideon return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-car or Tribulum, between which and their feet put Thorns to tear their flesh as they were tread and trod under the Tribulum; and after which sort also David used some of the Ammunites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron

Teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Seonoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in half, either for Men or Cattel, Moser, Gen 33. 17. witnesseth, that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Seon in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place being the Red Sea, where the Children of Israel, as they came from Ramesses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Seonoth: because there they for up their first Tabernacles: or Tents: which they used after for forty years in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Seonoth or Tabernacles, was instituted.

Other four Cities of Gad are named, Jofia 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilead, Maachanaim, Cheshon, and Jabzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jabzer, as Cheshon, or Hebron was chief City of Sehon, whence Numb 32. 1. his Country is called the Land of Jabzer. It was taken by Moses having first lent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In later times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Ely touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Ely, also Hierny in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammunites) by Judas Machabeus: as it is Mae 5. 8. where Junius out of Jofeph reads Jabzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gazer (as he gathereth out of Jof 16. 3. and Jud 1. 29.) was far from these Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomon time, for whom the King of Egypt was at war with the Canaanites, and gave it him as a Dowry with his Daughter.

Of Cheshon it may be marvelled that in the place of Jofias, and 1 Chron 6. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, seeing Jof 13. 17. it is reckoned for a principal City of the Reubenites: Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Carbon, 1 Mae 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Machabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Carbon had been the Cheshon of Gad, and that of Ruben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for so also it seems that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Maachanaim, which word signifieth a double Army, we read Gen 32. 2. that it was there met Jacob: and the Angels of God in that place to join with him for his defence: another Host or company, to join with his for his defence: as it is also Luke 2. 13. appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviour's birth: and so unto the King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was on foot to join battle with the Pagan Penda of middle England. But reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the Field where the Battle was fought, in the North parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Maachanaim, David abode during the rebellion of Abijah: and the fame for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Heliathai, during the War between David and the House of Saul. Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, which, King David lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mispha, of which Jof 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Job swore one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument: so also that it was called Mispha, which signifieth over-looking (because there they called God to over-see, and be witnesses to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen 31. 49. That in these parts there was not only a Town, but likewise a Region called Mispha, it appears Jof 11. 3. where we read of the Chibites under Herman, in the Country of Mispha, the Town of Mispha, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth verse following, beaten in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephtha the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whether his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mispha, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mispha rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Machabeus this Town of Mispha (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and the Males of it slain: for it was then posset of the Ammunites.

Between Seonoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jordan, which was Fenit, or Fenul, which name signifies Lowest (as Dei 4 place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To their places of the Gadites, they add Regelim, the City of that great and faithful subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Nabhanaim, where he followed King David, during Abdulis rebellion. To these they add the Town of Gadai, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gadai, being in Hebron no more than Gadites, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but fill of a River. Alimis, Adrichomius reads of ANIMOS, 1 Mae 5. 26. 6. that the name should rather be Alima, but Junius out of Jofeph reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and understanding Malle to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munio (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) he takes this Malle to be Mispha Mozabitarum, of which 1 Sam 22. 3. As for that Mispha which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mabachath which Moser notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasse, out of the bounds of this Tribe.

So also Dathma, of which 1 Mae 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be * Rithma, of which Numb 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammunites) and in like manner Mimith, and Abel vicinorum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephtha's pursuit of the Ammunites: treated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammunites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, as Deut 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphus which Ptolomy finds in Calofyria. Jerom and Calpurnius, Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammunites: but, as it seems, never posset by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammunites: whereupon at length it became the Regal seat of the Ammunites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzumim: which it was as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness, infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammunites had got from his Ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Affyrrians, and their adherents (as the Enims in Moab, and the Horim in Sir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammunites, the Enims were by Moab, and the Horim by the Edomites. Yet did the races of Emorens, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hebron had dispossessed Moab, so had Og of Babylon, the Ammunites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelphus: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries which were given to Ruben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450 years since that their Zamzumim, or Raphaim, were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kingdoms of one kindred, and both valiant and undaunting men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Ammunites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Law out of the Mountains, and into the Defarts. And as the Kings of Capitans of Perfia and Affyria (remembered in the 14th of Genesi) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom: so by that great conquest which Moser had over those two Ammunites, Og and Sehon, did the Mozabites and Ammunites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains: and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became faithless and licentious: they taking the advantage, invaded them, and called them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and virtue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four of breadth. The City was taken in David's time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias, was shot to death, having been, by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill success after, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which was kings of Ammon wore: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idol, weighing a talent, which is 60 pound weight, after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and under him twelve others.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomy calleth the Hills of Hippus, a City of Calofyria: and Strabo, * Trachon: the same which continue from near Damascus unto the Deserts of Moab: and receive divers names, as commonly appears, of Moab: which neighbour and bound divers that Trachon: far from the South part, as far Northwards as Abaroth, the chief City of Og, they are called these parts of Moab: from thence Northward, they are called these parts of the name of Herman, for so Moser calleth the men them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Deut 34.

* The letter N in the Hebrew are very like, so that one is often mistaken for another, and sometimes put for another, as for Damascus, 1 Chron 7. we have Damascus. Gen 10. 4. Other names of this City, according to Sepphorus, were Amman and Ashtar: but in this latter perhaps be mislikes, which might seem to be the time Ashtar, one of the chief Cities of Og, of which in that which remains of the spoken of, Ashtar Adrichomius says, it was also called Orti Ashtarum, because of the river Orti's winding about it: but in the place Ashtarum, if we must read with others, Ashtar Ashtarum, yet it cannot be taken of Orti it self, but of some other Fort adjoining, Gen 14.

Hauser their King from the Romans, in the year of our redemption 636 and in the year 1147. Conrad the third, Emperor of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwine the third, King of Jerusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, Brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterwards Emperor, Theodorick Earl of Flunders, and other Princes assembled at Platonia Acon, on the Sea-coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprise.

In the year 1262. Holon the Tartar incompass it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatened extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendered the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the Son of Holon, was by his Father made King thereof.

In the year 1400. Tumbarlain Emperor of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000 (if the number be not mistaken). He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners: those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Castle adjoining: he forbore the demolishing of the City, in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with forty Gates, or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 90000 Lavers of Gold and Silver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again surprised Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three Months siege, he forc'd it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired mercy. But Tumbarlain commanding them to enter the Church he burnt them and it, to the number of 30000 and to demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their Houses, knew them not by the Foundations. And as a Trophie of his victory, he raised three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and re-possessed by the Sultan of Egypt with a Garrison of Mumtaz: And in the year 1517. Selim Emperor of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth, inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations.

SECT. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hos, the Son of Aram, or by Damascus the Son of Elizur, Abraham's steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till David's time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it so, that it had some Reges, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of these parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrow Adad Prince of Sophora, or Syria Zoba: the Game Nation which Pliny calleth Nabata, inhabiting between Babylonia and Expilath. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their Vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-East parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief Principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders great vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely, Damascus, or Aram, Sophora, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba's of which there were the Princes in David's and Salomon's times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus, Adad Prince of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth, that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adad when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leaders of those fugitives, which were led and sent to Hadad, Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battle slain with 22000 Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adad, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus: Adad, and Adad of Damascus, being both slain. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath, or Uraza, having that his neighbour and enemy Adad was utterly overthrow, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in doing, faith St. Hieronim: it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrans and Idonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judeans and the Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascus, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Uraza: to which I may add Golbuz, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joining in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palatina it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idomea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab there to destroy all the male Children thereof: Adad of the Kings feed, fled into Egypt: and there was married to Leisur the Queens Sister, as before: who hearing of David's death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and, as Isaiah thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adad, the Son of Rebohu, whom Isaiah said invaded, was the Founder of that Principality: and the first of Adads who forsaking his Fathers name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the title of Adad, the great God of the Abyrians, faith Macrobis, which signified Oneness of Unity. Isaiah did a City called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad, Rezon, Ben-hadad, El-ad were of the same name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli adjoined. And that Adad was of great power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that David undertook the war: Secondly, because he levied 22000 Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascus had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: Thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adad was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desert, as far as to Euphrates, according to Pliny: and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whoever was the first, whether Adad, or Adad of Idomea, Rezon, was the second: who was an enemy to Isaiah all the days of Salomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, it seemeth, to be referred to Hadad of Idomea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23 Years after he was carried thither.

The

The third King of Damascus, and of Zobab both, was Hezion: to Hezion succeeded Talabrommon, or Talabrommon: to him Benhadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Afa King of Juda the Son of Abiam, the Son of Roboam, the Son of Salomon, being vexed and invaded by Baspha, the Successor of Nadab, the Son of Joashabam, sent to Benhadad the Son of Talabrommon, the Son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baspha fought to kill him against Afa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Afa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Country of Nephthim, and took divers Cities, and Spoils thereof: Afa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baspha had brought to fortify Rams withal, and converted them to his own use.

This Benhadad Father, Talabrommon, was in league with Afa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Afa requir'd the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his Son: though it seemeth that the Gold and Silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Talabrommon invaded Israel, before the entrance of his Son Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Afa, spake as followeth: The City which my Father took from thy Father, I will restore, and thou shalt, make Streets or Keepers of the borders for thee in Damascus, as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Talabrommon was Father indeed to Benhadad, which invaded Baspha, at the request of Afa: But this Benhadad that twice entered upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the Son of Abiam, the first of that name, the confederate of Afa and Abiam, as before, than the Son of Talabrommon. For between the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Baspha's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49 years, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30 years of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baspha, and after that 49 years ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty, lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make War. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pomp: but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32 Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the Son of Talabrommon invaded Baspha and Omri's and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows: the first at Samaria, by a fall of 700 number in effect, the second at Aphe, where with the like number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 20000 of the Aramites: besides 27000 which were carried by the fall of the wall of Aphe. And this Benhadad, Achab again setteth at liberty: to whom he rendereth those Towns that his Father had taken from the Predecessor of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three years after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Joashab. The Aramites came to succour and fight, in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Nazman, to Joash the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosy, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picked a quarrel against Joash: and when Joash, by Elizeus his intelligence had escaped his plot, he sent Men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is before said. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from Heaven he departed home, and sickness, and sendeth Azazel with great gifts to Elizeus, to know 3234. his estate, if he might live. Azazel returning, informeth him. Zonaras and Codorus call this Benhadad Adar, and the Son of Adar: Amos and Jeremy mention the Towers of Benhadad which were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorance, faith he, that scarce yet 1100 years are complete since their wars with the Israelites.

Hezion or Azazel, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was anointed by Elihu, or Elihu, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad should recover his present sickness: He waged War with Joash, who received divers wounds at the encounter of Ramoth Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jezebel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah or Odoziah, are slain by Joab, as before is said. After the death of Joash, Azazel continued War against Joab, and wasted Gilead, and all the portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath: but by gifts from Joab he was availed from attempting Jerusalem: for he persecuted him all the Israhelites which *Jeiel*ophat, Jochanan, and Ahaziah his Fathers, King of Juda, had dedicated, and which he himself had dedicated: and all the Gold which was found in treasures of the Lord and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Afa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to War upon Baspha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joab and Azazel, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principal persons. Lastly, Azazel vexed Joab the Son of Joab, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty Horse-Men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Foot-men, of all his people.

SECT. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFTER Hezion, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the Son of Hezion reigned 30. years in Damascus who fought against Israhel with ill success: for King of Israel, the Son of the unhappy Joashab, as he was foretold by Elihu the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three several battles: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hezion had taken violently from Joashab.

After this Benhadad the Son of Hezion there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicholau Damascenus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the Son of Joash recovered Damascus it self to Juda, faith the Geneva, but better in Junius, Velle recuperabat Damascum, & Chamath Judea pro Israel: that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamath of Judea: for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda. And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no story. For when as Joash the King of the ten Tribes had three overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the Son of Hezion, Hazeel had won from Israel, and so let his Kingdom to his Son Jerobam the second; it seemeth that this Jerobam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his Fathers good Fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosaphat, Rafes after Zorobab, Rasfon, the tenth Adad, making league with Pekab, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda, both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Jerusalem; but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Affyrans becoming matters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order are thus reckoned:

- 1 Adadzer the Son of Rehab.
- 2 Rezin the Son of Elhadad, or Razin.
- 3 Hezion.
- 4 Talmonem.
- 5 Bahadad, who invaded Basfha.
- 6 Bahadad the second, taken prisoner by Achaz.

7 Hazeel, whom Elifha foretold with tears of his advancement; the same who overthrew Joash King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazeel which preceded Bahadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazeel which took Goth, and compounded the War with Joa, made the Expedition thirty years, and perchance more, after the first Hazeel which flisted his master Bahadad, and had slain Joash the Son of Achab King of Israel. For Joash began to reign in the seventh year of Joah King of Israel; and after he had reigned twenty three years, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazeel, took Goth, and turned his Face towards Jerusalem. It is also some proof that Hazeel, that took Goth, was not the same with Hazeel that murdered Bahadad, because he could not at that time be of good years, being as it seemeth, the second person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Bahadad's Men of War. To this Hazeel (be he the first or second) succeeded, 8 Bahadad, the third, whom Joash King of Israel thrice overthrew.

9 Rezin, or Rezin, the last, who joined with Pekab King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda, waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Bahadad the third and Rezin the last, Nadab Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we find that Joab was King of Emath, or Canath, in David's time, to whom he sent his Son Joah with presents, after David's victory against Adadzer. Also Sonachorib spakech of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IV.

Of Other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Affyrans, never recovered themselves again.

OF Gessur we find two Kings named; to wit, Talmat, and his Father Amunimur: to Talmat, whose Daughter David married, it was, that Abelom fled, who was his maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephena, of Syria, Soba, or Calofyria, there are two named, Rebub, or Reebob, the Father of Adadzer, and Adadzer himself; and it is plain that after his death the feat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their greatness. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desart of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads as it began with David, to it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Achaz King of Juda waged the Affyrans Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus it self, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Affyrans attempt Israel. For first Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem governing Israel) who floot the enterprise of Phul with a thousand talents of Silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warran, as yet, in his feat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had writed from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his Son Teglat following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding fo excellent an occasion, as the War began between Israel and Juda, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, and waited in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his impit and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease possit himself of the Cities of Neptalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his Son Salmanassar, whom Polemey called Nabonassar, after the revolt of Hofia, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdom asunder. So as the lineare race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted, the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hofia, whom Salmanassar overturned, happened near about a time: this of Ninus in the days of Belochus, and the other two in the days of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanassar his Son. For Sardanapalus perished, Ofia ruling Juda: and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Sennacherib, the Son of Salmanassar, in vain, and preferred for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly overcome. Jerusalem and the Temple burnt 132 years after the captivity of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth year of Hofia: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affyr and and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanassar: to the last of Balthassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200 years. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria, about 220 years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turks, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in War and Peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Jerusalem.

SECT. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Jericho, Gilgal, Mithpa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah, and Gibba.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest Son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachael, there were numbered at Mount Sina 35000 able bodied: all which perishing in the Desart, there entered the Holy Land of their heirs 45000 fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe nearest Jordan, are Lad, Haddid, and Ono: of which, Lad and Ono were built by Shemed a Benjaminite: they were all three re-inhabited with Benjaminites, after the return out of Captivity, as is mentioned Nehem. 11. 35. and Ezra. 2. 35. where Adrielimus reading Lad, Haddid, Ono, makes besides Haddid in Netemita, a City called Lad-haddid: This Haddid or Chaddid was rebuilt by Simun Machabeus.

Samaria, or Tjemarrin, named of Tjemar one of the Sons of Canan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitful Valley adorned with many Palm-trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Joshua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achaz: in whose days Chib of Bethel had the new foundation of it, in the lofs of Abiram his eldest Son, and built the gates of it in the lofs of his youngest Son Segub: according to the curse of Joshua: in which and other respects, Hof. 12. 1. 4. calleth Joshua a Prophet. In aftertimes it was destroyed by Shishan, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the South-east of Jericho stood * Halmom of the Levites, of which Jof. 21. 18. To the South, Beth-arab, of which Jof. 21. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Joshua first ate of the fruits of the land, surrounded all those born in the Desart: and celebrated the Passover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canan) is noted Jof. 5. 9. Ob destructionem propter Aegyptum, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled down the Hill: which from thence was called Collis preparationum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Jof. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Jof. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hills Do. 11. Garazim and Habal: upon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the Mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mithpa of Benjamin (of which also read oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the Land of Canan: for which reason * Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgment to the Israelites: of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was near Jordan on the East side of this Tribe and Mithpa, near the West Sea, towards the Land of the Philistines.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is * Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Ark rested, after they past over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-jeharim, and at length to Jerusalem) here in Gilgal it was, that Joshua pitched up the 12 Stones, which were taken out of the Channell of Jordan, when it was dry, that the Israelites might pass over it: by which Story, as it is set down Jof. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was, that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And so for Mithpa, whither Samuel came yearly for judgment, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levites War against Gibba, and the Benjaminites, Jof. 20. 1. and another against the Philistines, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Machabeus gathered the Jews (when Jerusalem was possessed by the Heathens) as it is 1 Macc. 3. 47. their great meetings, wherefore, besides the Priests did use to bring the Ark to it, as is shewed in the Book of the City Jerusalem, 1 Sam. 12. 11. 12. 14. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100.

* It was no other than this Mispa of Gilead, of which Jof. 18. 25. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Jerusalem was recovered from the Jehobites, and also in the time of the Maschabees (as we have said) when Jerusalem was washed by the wicked under Antiochus, to all in the time of Jeremy, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah, whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jeremy, as Governor over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treason of Ismael, one of the royal blood of Juda, as it is Jer. 41.

Near unto this Mispa, the Scripture mentioneth Beulah, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistines.

Touching Beulah, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was antiently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Jehoiachin (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nob. 11. 31. and Jof. 18. 22.) and how another City called Luz + near adjoining to it, was built by the man of the City which it owed the entrance to the Spits, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Levi's wifen: and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Beulah (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Beulah, that is, the house of Vanity, 1st. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well pass them over.

The Territory of Beulah, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 13. was taken from them, and adjoynt to the Kingdom of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Story of Jofias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Beulah, 2 Reg. 23. whence those calls 1 Mace. 11. 34. are called Aphephemas, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories, or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Ditum of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hebron, which Jof. 18. 23. is called Hebron, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Beulah, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Ramah, Gidza, and Geba. Of the name Ramah, * it is not clear already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they had our Ramah in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Matt. 2. it appears that it bordered Benjamin) and also out of Benjamin and Benjamin had Silo to have been called Ramah, and had yet another Ramah in Zabulon's tribe three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Ramah in the Tribe of Assir, as it seems, we have testimony, Jof. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthali, Jof. 19. 36. of a third Ramah, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25. 1. which, more often is called * Ramatha, and 1 Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tephrim: for which the Septuagint have Araramath, Ramatha Tephrim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning: for a part of the word, whence they think Tephrim of Araramath, Matt. 27. 57. was denominated.

It is named for one of the three Præfectures which Demetrius yielded to the Jews out of the country of Samaritan: this lying towards the East to Jericho, and Lydah toward the West, and Aphephemas (of which even now we speak) lying in the middle between the two other. A sixth it seems there was in the Tribe of Sindon toward the South, which Jof. 19. 18. is called Rama of the South, and otherwise Basethah Idem.

Of a fourth Rama we read, 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramah in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, situated, as we said, near Beulah the uttermost South-border of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Basethah in the time of Aza King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did fly from him to Aza. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think Tephrim was, that buried Christ: because it was nearer to Jerusalem, and where the Captivity belonged to Judea, as it appears, Eph. 2. 26. wherein that it is joynted with Geba, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose Towns Geba (after Basethah had ceased to build it) Aza (as it is 1 Reg. 25. 22.) built Geba adjoining to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Geba the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read that Jehoiachin through all his Kingdom, even from Geba, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibza, which was the City of Saul (the wickedness of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out the name of Benjamin) confounds with Geba, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Esa. 10. 27.) of which word * Gibza, in another from Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinity of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears, Jud. 19. 13. where the Levite with his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibza. By that place of 1 Sam. 22. 6. it seems that there was in this Gibza some Tower or Citadel called Rama: where Junius reads in excessu, mur in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City, was Rama: as it seems that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the College of Prophets abode, was Naboth Idem. The great City of Hai overthrowen by Jofias, which Jof. 7. 2. is placed near Beulah, upon the East of Beulah, was in this Tribe, as is proved, Nob. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Jof. 18. 23. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Jof. 8. 28. In folitudinem, in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief note is reckoned Jof. 18. 25. in this Tribe was Gibzon, the chief City of the Hevites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to save their lives is set down, Jof. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nephthim, or Prophets, and were bound to certain public services in the house of God: which oath of living chief Gibzonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 Sam. 21. 1. This Gibzon, or Gibzon with Almon and Jebah (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanoboth, the natal place of Jeremy the Prophet, were said Jof. 21. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjaminites. Near to this Hanoboth was Nob, as appears, 1 Reg. 2. 26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob, before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanoboth. Its reckoning in the Tribe of Benjamin, Nob. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Ark was at Kirath-jabrin: yet by the lamentable tragedy of blood-thirst, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down 1 Sam. 21. and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it is proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, Nobem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Ezay. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas, Saul had his Camp, 1 Sam. 13. 2. (where he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Machabees his abode, 1 Mace. 9. 73. Of Gibza in Gallim, Jephthah makes often mention, but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the natal place of St. Paul, whence (they say) it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharsus, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of less importance I omit, and come to the City of Jerusalem, and the Princes and Governors of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Jof. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

SECT. II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Jerusalem.

AT what time Jerusalem was built (which afterward became the Princes of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedech was the Founder thereof in Abraham's time. But, * according to others, that City out of which Melchisedech encountered Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Perjan Kings or Captains, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse bordering Laban, which was also called Salem, and by the Greeks Solima.

Jerusalem (whenever, or by whomsoever built) was a principal City in Israhel's time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those days and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Israhel slew) was then King of Jerusalem. That it was flowing to the Jehobites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Mefis's time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400 years after him: even till David won it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jehobites (the children of Jehoshaphat the son of Canaan) built: after whom it was called Jebur. And so much did that Nation rely on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blind, and impotent people should defend it.

David, after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Jehobites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadel or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces and other buildings: changing the name from Jehobalem, the City of the Jehobites, to Jerusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolima. After David's time Salomon amplified, beautified and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the work of the Temple, which was no less admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, Gates, and Walls, could not any where in the world be exemplated: and women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60 foot depth, cut out of the very rock: and 250 foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom been heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishak King of Egypt, and his Predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Ahaz and Manasse, and Jeroboam Solomon's servants: and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishak first invaded the Territory of Juda, entered Jerusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not only of the riches of Solomon, but of all those spoils which David had gotten from Adadzeer, Tobus, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sackt, and a part of the wall thrown down by Jozab King of Israhel: while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

Not long after, Achaz the fiftenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and preferred Typhaz Israhel's to the treasures thereof. And Manasse the son of Achaz, the son of Achaz, by the wants made by Ezechias, to the Embassadors of Movadeb, left the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Josiah then reigning. But this ungrateful, idolatrous and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods-given corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kind of impiety, hating the City even to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nebuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers, which embraced them, even and level with the dust, carried away the spoils with the Princes and people, and crushed them with the heavy yoke of bondage and servitude full seventy years, inasmuch as Jerusalem was not only become as a torn plowed field, but as a heap of stones, and rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars, but (as Jeremias speaks) even the birds of the Air (concoined to fly over it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled foil).

Then 70 years being expired, according to the Prophecy of Daniel, and the Jews by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was again built, though with interruption and difficulty enough: and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls or other defences, for some 60 and odd years, till Nebuchadrezzar the favour of Artaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Babgels, or Vashti, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by Ptolemaeus the first: then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Crispin in his Parthian expedition took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industry or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the Land, though the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple: and after the captivity, the same was done by Artaxerxes Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Jerusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the City or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous works did to adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious than they had been in the days of Solomon.

SECT. III.

Of the Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and after his death and ascension, it continued about forty years. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ's death, and to punish the Jews' final ingratitude, incamp'd it with a Roman Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jews from all parts were come up to the celebration of the Passover: so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts: and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civil dissension, oppress them within the Walls: a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jews Kingdom, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, these perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand souls: and the City was to be beaten down and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such place of habitation. Only the three Herodian Towers, (works most magnificent, and overtopping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman Garrisons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and state remaining, after ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more things, that thereover became victorious.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judaea, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the City: and by degrees to re-build, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65 years, when they again offered to revolt and rebel, Elms Adrianus the Emperor slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold: That there should not stand one stone upon another of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his tury was appeared, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Ælia Capitolina. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sower to be cut in Marble, and set it in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jews Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare to much as to behold it from any other high place overtopping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palæstina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and especially by Christians: and so it continued 500 years.

It was afterward in the 336 year after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400 and odd years.

In the year 1099, it was regained by Godfrey of Bullion, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens: which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, offered to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successors of Godfrey, four score and eight years: till in the year 1197, it was regained by Saladin of Egypt: and lastly, in the year 1517, in the time of Selim, the Turke call'd out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzambazur, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jerusalem alone that had so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in several times and ages, suffered the same shipwreck. And it hath been Gods just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not only to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places who possess it: of the walls and buildings, yea, of the soil and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all their fertility and fruitfulness: witness the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the days of the Kings of Juda and Israel: it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not only to consume with fire from Heaven the Cities of the Sodomites: but the very soil it self hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himself: neither was it enough that Achan himself was stoned, but that his moveables were so consumed and brought to ashes.

SECT. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diversely and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leaders: who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diondre and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Mos governed Egypt, the people were to be increased: as Tertullian and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moser and Aaron: for the name of Moser was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Justin, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings: of whom, Damascius, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moser, and Israhel. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israhel had ten sons, among whom he divided the land of Juda: so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sons of Israhel he call'd Joseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magical Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and was prodigious; and this Joseph (saith he) was father Abraham: who with the rest, by reason of their foul diseases, and least they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found relief the seventh day, for this cause ever after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy: making it a law among themselves: which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not marry out of their own Tribes, lest discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath

Cornelius

of the history of the World.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratory of their Temple, they had the golden head of an As, which they adorned. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the fifth book of his own History truly confest of the Jews, that they worshipp'd one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any material figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Representation, no more to much as in any City by their inhabitants. Somewhat like this, hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus, who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jews.

Claudian Iolas draws them from Judean, whose parents were Spartan and Thibis; whence it came, that the Spartan or Lacedæmonian challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Josaphus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wrested and perverted, according to the custom of the Heathen. For so have they obscured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood: and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sons in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moser, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews: all which feignings as touching the Jews and their originals, Josaphus against Apion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth:

and so Chaldean originally taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or Cile (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarian, derive the Hebrews, or Jews, from Arishon: having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Arishon: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites: at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, renowned the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judeans, or Jews: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdom of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation under-went, was first paternal: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moser and Josias, by a policy Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom, and his Successors, before we intrate, we are first to speak of their government under Judges, after the death of Josias: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Josias, to the War, of Troy: which was about the time of Jephthah.

SECT. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Josias's death: and of Othaniel.

WHEN Josias was now dead, who with the advice of the 70 Elders, and the high Priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Simon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they performed by few ten thousand, but made Adonibach prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites. This Tyrant's cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kind upon his own head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confess and acknowledge Gods judgments against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simon did also master and possess during this Inter-regnum (or as some think, before the death of Josias) the Cities of Bezan, Askelon, Ekron, and Jerusalem, which they burnt, and the Philistines as re-embellied. They took also the Cities of Hormon, Dibon, or Kiriath-japhet, and Zephath, afterwards Hera. And although it be not far down in express words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moser and Josias did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he, with the advice of Phineas, directed and ordered their wars. For any thing that they proceeded without a Chief, the good success which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josias governed, as appears, Jos. 10. 39: that propounded the attempt of Dibon, to the rest of the Captains: for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Asubah: which he performed to Othaniel his younger brother after the conquest: whole habitation in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his prefferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they only recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories. In which war they laboured with variable success: for as the house of Josiah recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, to did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries, and forc'd them to save themselves in the

H h Mountains,

SECT. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations : and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

There lived in this age of Oboniel, Pandor, or Pandarus, according to Homere, the fifth King of Athen : who began to rule in the twentieth year of Oboniel, and governed forty years. He was father to Eriothus : his daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thesbe : of whose daughter Semele was born Dionysus, or Liber Pater : under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Melm, Paphos, and Tharsus were built.

Ida and Dardanus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron : but Genius hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brass.

Not long after this time, Amphion and Zeus gave Thesbe : whose divines Chronologers find in Ehuds time. But St. Augustine makes a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civiti Dei, and of this mans progeny, where he that desires his pedigree may find it. Ladanius and Eusebius make him native of Attica : and the son of Elophus King of Elafusa : which Elafus by careful industry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of great famine.

This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent : who because he made exceeding great speed to return and to relieve his people with Corn from some neighbour Nation : it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the air.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Oboniel, and after him, with the rest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow : for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars ; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life : and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgment. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves to converse with these ancient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the antient Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder days, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet to edify any mans understanding, save his own ; but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes ; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth : and after in the times of the Judges

SECT. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Terus, Tantalus, Tytius, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

After the death of Oboniel, when Israel fell back to their former Idolatry, God encouraged Mash to invade and suppress them : to perform which, he joined the forces of Ammon, and Amalek unto his own, and so (as all kind of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easy conquest over Israel, whom God himself exposed to those perils, within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years under Egdon King of the Mobites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his ears from their crying repentance : but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them : by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the justness of his quarrel, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Egdon, whom if he could but extirpate, he assured himself of the following victory : especially giving his Nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Ambassador to Egdon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access, upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc'd his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge : and shutting the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem, that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did re-pass Jordan, and invading the Territory of Mash, overthrew their Army, consisting of 10000 able and strong men : whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Sangar his Successor had miraculously slain 600 Philistines with an Ox-goad : the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of four-score years from the death of Oboniel, which term expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the days of Ehud, Nami, with Eliabech her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Mash, and to the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore years which are given to Ehud, it was that Acus King of the Molossians, otherwise Plato, stole Proserpina, as he walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponion in Sicilia : or (according to Pausanias) by the River Panofin Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chloris, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This flesh being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Heracleus and Theseus joined themselves, they agreed together to recover her : but Plato, or Acus (whom others call Aidmon) had (as they say) a very huge Dog, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tore him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Heracleus speedily rescued him, and by strength took and muzzled the Dog Cerberus : whereof grew the fable of Heracleus his delivering Theseus out of Hell. But Zeus, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, faith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidmon, King of the Molossians, who had Cora to Wife, the mother of Proserpina : Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs, being known to Aidmon, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken ; and because Pyrithous was the principal in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of affection or infatuation, the one was given for food to Aidmon his great Dog Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Heracleus, by the instigation of Eurythius, delivered him by strong hand. The Molossians, which Stephanus writes with a single S were a people of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus : of which Mountains Ossa is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossians in Thessaly : but these are neighbours to the Calipolai, faith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erythraeus, King of Athen, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind, because Thrace is situate North from Athen. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athen to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut her tongue, that she might not complain : perfwading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloath, and sent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne caused her only son Ips to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, to death, as it appeared to be some other ordinary food : of which when he had eaten his fill, the caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him : and then fled away with such speed towards Athen, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that he was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis, in Flores : and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias Lih. 4. hath built near the Rocks Mergi, in the Territory Panofin of Athen. By which, as also by the name Daulis, Act. where these things are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulian Alce) it appears that it is true, which Theophrastus notes by Thucyd. 4. of digestion in his Poloponnesian War, that Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thrace, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odyseus) but that Phocias a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King : whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his Son-in-law: as it is good to be true. Erich Eubolides, that Pandion King of Athena made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdom of Odyse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poet chose a Swallow for Progne, to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias says, Danidile, nee nidificans, nee habitans in tota circum regione Hirundinis as if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her Sister, did for ever after hate that place.

Near this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætas King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be sacrificed to the Plough: for in those Countries where the Ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

In the fifteen and fortieth year of Eubod, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name: about which time Phenome the chief Priest of Apollo in Delphos, devised the Heroical Verge.

Of the time date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were antiently Moones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that Moones have applied to the passion of love: and some to the covetous that dare not give his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the Son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Dionysius and Pydmon in Zeuxis, give him another Mother. He was said to be the Son of Jupiter, as some will have it: because he had that Planet in his ascendant, brokering Wisdom and Riches. It is said, that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own Son to be slain and drest to the Banquet: of whom Ceres eat part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified, that those Men which feed after Divine knowledge, prefer nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own Children, of all else the most dearest. And where fruit was devised, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the World, yet his mind being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Virg.

Quærit aquas in aquis, & potus fugacis cap-tae
Tantalus, boe illi garula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and drest his.
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught Wisdom and Virtue to mortal Men: which Story, Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly express'd in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace again covetousness.

Tantalus à labris suis fugientia capiat Flamina; quid rixas? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streams, that from him flee.
Why laugh'st thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is signified of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods, to vain and unworthy Men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis, out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatur,
Coctamque convivia Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortality, He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give
To guests of his own age, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure vulgar. For as the cleanest Meats in a foul stomach, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserved mysteries are often perverted by an unclean and doted mind.

To you it is given (saith Christ in Mark) to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are Mark 13 without, all things be done in Parables. So it is said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen infer upon a place of St. Paul: Quod si Paulo hinc est effari ea, quorum ipse cognovit non calumtorum & neque ad illud pro- gressu suppeditavit, forsitan de Deo, nihil aliud amplius Gregorius confutavit: si Pauli magis have intus the things, et recte vult komologari verborum the third Heaven, and his going thither, one diffidit bring unto him, peradvantage we might know Jovanabat Dec.
more of God. 2 Cor. 13.

Pythagoras, saith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wife Man, Afno lyram exponere, ant mythia, que ita reperiunt, ut sus tubum, & fidem Graculus, & angustia
Scarabæus: quare filium indicis discipulis, ne vulgo divinorum arcana pateficerent, que meditando facilius quàm loquendo apprehenduntur: To sit an Aft to a Harp, or to learn mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jya Viol, or Scarabæus, and vulcan fides (significavit Orisment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his Disciples, that they should not disclose divine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learned by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Eggyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the vulgar: and that they might below the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Eubod, with him it is also said, that Tyris lived, whom Apollo slew, because he fought to force his Mother Lara. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tyris was the Son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus: which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the Earth, where he was delivered of Tyris: whose Mother dying, and himself therein nourished, he was therefore called the Son of the Earth. Pausanias speaking of the grave of this Giant, affirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

Hom. Od. Porcellusque novum Tytius pringeratorra, Affluat atro viscere passit aet.

Nine furlongs firteth, lies Tyris, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry Birds with his renewing Liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound: That Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phocia, it was signified by the Poets, to the terror of others, That he was still eaten in Hell by Birds, and yet still lived, and had his Flesh renewed.

Admetus, King of Thessaly, lived also in this age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced: but having slain Hyaenanthus, he crost the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where, together with Nepheus, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his Bread by working in Brick, for building of the Walls of Troy, not by making the Bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him, in Ovid, which saith:

Illionsaetres, fronsaque turribus altis
Menia, Apollinee frusta canore lyre.

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wise Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Magicians witness, saith Pausanias.

In these days also of Eubod, or (as some find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perseus, the Son of Jupiter and Danæ, by whose Soldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus, to seek their adventure on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successeur of Phobos, being weakly accompanied, as the hunted near the Lake Triton, was surprised and slain: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her Head to be immortalized, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such, and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereto grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into Stones.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and seventh King of Athena, and Arcturus the 13. or, after Eusebius, the fourteenth King of the Argives, began also their reigns, as it is said, in the time of this Judge: of which, the first lived forty years, and the second thirty one years. Also Bellerophon lived in this age, being the Son of Glaucon, the Son of Sisyphus: who inticed by Ates, or Sinhonia, the Wife of Prætas of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, the accused him to her husband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætas sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affairs of weight, between him and his Son-in-law Jabater: giving secret orders to Jabater to dispatch him: but Jabater thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting, or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the reports) pitying his innocence, sent him the winged Horse, Pegasus, sprung up of the blood of Medusa, formerly slain by the Soldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him: a Horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: upon which Erat Bellerophon overcame Chimæra: and performed the other services given him in charge: which done, as he returned towards Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to have slain him: but being victorious also over all those, he arrived at Jabater in safety: whom Jabater for his eminent virtues honoured, with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew so infolent, as he attempted to fly up to Heaven upon his Pegasus: whose pride, Jupiter disdained, caused one of his flinging Flics to vex Pegasus, as he cast of Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blind: of which burthen, Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to Heaven: and being fed in Jupiter's own stable, Aurora begged him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diversely expounded: as first by some, That it pleased God to relieve Men in their innocent and undeserved adversity, as to calldown those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreme hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing overproud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of sorrow, and over-drawing misery. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruel Pyrat of the Lycians, whose Ship had in her prow a Lion, a Goat in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the Stern, of which three Beasts, this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purified with a kind of Gally, of such swiftnes, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of Sails (the Wings of a Ship) are also attributed. Many other explications are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a Ship, for Virgil calleth one of the greatest Ships of Athena.

Lufo, from whom the Abonians (being ignorant of the antiquity of their parent Javan) derive their name of Inner, is said to have been about Eubod's time: Homer callsthem Janner, which hath a near resemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himself took name from Javan: it being a custom observable in the Histories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-Father, in some the principal of his issue.

The invasion of India by Liber-Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but St. Augustine makes him far more ancient: placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Jesús.

About the end of the eighty years, ascribed to Eubod, and Sanger, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

SECT. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFTER Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80 years, they again began to forget the Giver of all goodnes, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of Gods deliverance by Eubod: and after him by Sanger: the rest began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle security: so is security a fruitful in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subversion: of which, all estates in the World have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their sins were again ripe for punishment, Jabir King of Hazor, after the death of Eubod, invaded the territory

ritory of Israel; and having in his service 900 iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty years, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah the Prophetess, who encouraged Barak to levy a force out of Nephthali, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the Men of Nephthali were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seem to have proceeded partly from the authority that Barak had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible than in others, because Hizzor and Hirshah the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nephthali. So in the days of Jephthah the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites, with whom the War was pressed most upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Israel from the Mozabites: and by the counsel and courage of a Woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Jael the Kanite wife: so was it his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Asyrius Nabuchodonosor, who was King of Kings, and restless, he overcame by his own imaginations, the causes of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchless pride into the base humbleness of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by invincible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angel, or as he did the Egyptians in Moses's time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by hail stones in the time of Josiah: sometimes by the ministry of Men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East. Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household Servants of Abraham. He caused the Mozabites and Ammonites to set upon their own confederates, the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them, to kill one another in the fight of Jehoshaphat: and of the like to these, a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetess, speak unto Barak in these words, But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall fill Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanites Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last Man: in the end of which War it seemeth, that Jabin himself also perished, as appears by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his power, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry, by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were feared and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not join themselves to the rest, as those of Ruben in Gilead: that the Asyrites kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the Children of Dan, who neighbored the Sea, crept into their Ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect, lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Meroz, who dwelling near the place of the battle (belike fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Jael the Wife of Heber the Kanite, who who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they withdrew their love and faith to their ancient Friends. Lastly, she curseth the Mother of Sisera who promised her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied to her self, and described the spoils both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, the directeth her praise and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barak purchased unto Israel, there passed forty years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544 years, was translated to Mycene. The translation of this Kingdom, Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lycus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Alus, the Son of Lycus divided the Kingdom: of which Arcifus being eldest, held Argos it felt: Praetor his Brother possessed Epipora, or Corinth, and Tyrinthos, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea: there being many Monuments in Tyrinthos, which witness Praetor's possession, faith Pausanias.

Now Arcifus was foretold by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the Son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no Man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is feigned that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with Child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings Son, or other worthy Man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was born: who when he grew to Mans estate, either by chance (saith Cicero) or in shewing his Grand-Father the invention of the discois, or Leaden Ball, slew him unwillingly. After this, Perseus, to avoid the infamy of Parricide in Argos, changed Kingdoms with his Uncle Praetor: and built Mycene. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custody, Heraeus hath this witty observation:

Inclusam Danaen turris ab omni,
Rebusq; excubis, et vigilis canum
Triplicis excubie munierant satis
Noturnis ab Adulteris:

Si non Acrifium Virginis abdide
Cygnidem pavidum, Jupiter & Venus
Risissent, fore eum tutum iter & patens, Converso in pretium Doo.

Aurum per medios ire satellites,
Ei porramque amant, fax, potentius Isti fulmine.

The brazen tower with doors close barr'd,
And watchful bandogs frightful guard,
Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret love:
Till smiling Venus, and wife Jove
Begun'd her Fathers dread,
For chang'd into a golden shower,
The God into her lap did pour:
Himself, and took his pleasure.
Though guards and stony walls to break,
The thunder-bolt is far more weak,
Than is a golden treasure.

The

The first Kings of the Argives were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first year of Jacob, and the 61 of Isaac: from which time, to the end of Sihelene, Cassio miseconechth 400 years. This Kingdom before the translation, Eurythius accounteth to have stood 544 years, others but at 417. It was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phloroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Piraeus,
Phorbus, Tripotus,
Crotopus,

Siheleneus,
Danaus, Lycus,
Alus, Arcifus, Pelop.

After the translation to Mycene, Mar. Scutus finds these Kings:

Perseus, Siheleneus,

Eurythius,

The Sons of Pelopius by Hippodamia: and Arcus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agamemnon,
Eurythius,
Orestes,

Tisamenus, Pentibulus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leave out the two first, and the last, beginning with Eurythius: and ending with Pentibulus. In Tisamenus's time the Heraclides returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barak and Deborah, were Midas, who reigned in Phrygia: and Iliu, who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries with Deborah.

SECT. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dadalus, Spinks, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Deborah and Barak being dead, the Midianites, assisted by the Amalekites, invaded Israel. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: The Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore, now the neighbouring Nations did to master them in a short time (the hand of God being withheld from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hard access: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitful valleys: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew up: covering the Fields as thick as grasshoppers: which servitude lasted seven years.

Then the Lord by his Angel stirred up Gideon the Son of Joasaph, afterward called Jerubbaal: whose fear and unwillingness, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprise, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300 out of 32000 Men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300 by Gideon's appointment carried a Trumpet, and light, in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gave the great Army of his enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the crack of many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Army of Israel to be infinite, and smitten with a sudden fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed, fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tired with travel, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his Men being refreshed) he might overtake the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Sereb, which were taken already, and Zabab and Zalmunna; which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, fought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places there threatened the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would treat the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Penuel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Mozabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zaba and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these Men: as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of Men especially of those which follow the War, that both envy and malignant others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should fall, than hazard and want, than that such merit as they mistake, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wherefore it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Soldiers: yet he followed the opportunity, and purified his former victory to the uttermost: and smiting Zabab and Zalmunna in Karkar (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprised them, and slaughtered there 15000 remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000 and withall he took Zabab and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's Brethren before at Tabar, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request, slew them with his own hands; his Son whom he first they should be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandini, a people inhabited about the mouth of the River Parthenius, where Lyones the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Southseer of their company was slain by a wild Boar, also here Typhus died: and Aeneas undertook to fear the Ship. So they passed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucasus, and came to the River Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchis. When they were entered the Haven, Jafon went to Aetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliver the golden Fleece; which Aetes, as the Fable goes, promised to do, if he alone would yoke together two brazen hoof Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, sow Dragons Teeth, which Mineros had given to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These Bulls were great and fierce and breathed out Fire: Vulcan had given them to Aetes.

Whilst Jafon was in a great perplexity about this task, Medea the Daughter of Aetes fell into a most vehement love of him, so far forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came privily to him, promising her help: he would assure her of his marriage. To this Jafon agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine with which he bade him to anoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed Men would rise out of the ground, from the Teeth which he should sowe, and let upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, he bade him throw stones amongst them as soon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in such wise that he might easily fly them. Jafon followed her counsel: whereto when the event had answered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so far from approving his wish desire, that he devised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burn their Ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Jafon, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where, they say it was kept by a Dragon that never slept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medea cast into a sleep: so taking away the Golden Fleece, she went with Jafon into the Ship Argo: having with her, her Brother Absyrtus.

Aetes understanding the practices of Medea, provided to pursue the Ship, whom when Medea perceived to be at hand, she flew her Brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in divers places; of which Aetes finding some, was fain to seek out the rest, and suffer his Daughter to pass: the parts of his Son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Toni: the Greek word signifieth Division. Afterwards he sent many of his subjects to seek the Ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not back Medea, they should suffer in herstead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the slaughter of Absyrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither: when they came to the Islands Abyridae, there the Ship Argo (that their might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Ceres, from the murder of Absyrtus. Now they thereupon falling between the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and pulling through the Sea of Sardinia, and amongst the coasts of Hetruria, came to the Isle of Eoa, wherein Ceres dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they sailed by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well, that he stayed them. Only Euter (swam out unto them, whom Pour ravished, and carried to Lybiæ in Stilly to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came between Sylla and Carybdis, and the stragling Rocks, which seemed to call out great fowls of fancies and flocks. But Theseus and the Noviter, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sylla, where the Bees of the Sun were, and touched at Coryra, the Island of the Phaeac, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the Men of Colchis, hearing no news of it and fearing his anger, if they failed not his will, brook themselves to new habitations: Some of them dwelt in the Mountains of Coryra, others in the Islands of Abyridae, and some coming to the Phaeac, they found the Ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if the were not Jafon Wife, they should have her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arte, the Wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: whereto they of Colchis, not daring to return home, stayed with the Phaeac, so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Island, Minos reigned who had a Man of brass given to him (as fong of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This Man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was cloaked up with a brazen nail; his name was Talus, his custom was to run thrice a day about the Island for the defence of it. When he saw the Ship Argo pass by, he threw Stones at it, but Medea with her Magick destroyed him. Some say that she flew him by poisons, which he made mad; others, that promising to make him immortal, the drew out the nail that stopp his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that say he was slain by Pean, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Ægina, where they were fain to fight for fresh Water. And lastly, from Ægina they sailed by Eubæa and Locris, home to Jolchos, where they arrived, having spent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jafon, understand the mystery of the Philosophers Stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other superfluous Chimists draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that the golden Fleece was meant a golden Book of Parchment, which is of sheeps-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signify by Jafon, Wildom, and Moderation, which overcome all perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Derclius, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Jafon with the rest went indeed to rob Colchis, to which they might arrive by Boat. For not far from Caucasus, there are certain steep falling Torrents, which wash down many Grains of Gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting use to fit many fleeces of Wool in those descents of Waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water passed thorow, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many Rocks, Straits, Sands, and Currents in the passage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Pictorially converted into those fiery Bulls, the armed Men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleep, and the like. The Man of brass, the Syrens, Sylla and Carybdis, were other hazards wards and adventures which they fell into the Mediterranean Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poetical morals: all which Homer afterward used (the man of brass excepted) in the description of Ulysses his travels on the same In-land seas.

SECT. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Thebes, Hippolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base Son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sedomites, remembering what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetual Princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Sovereignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sedom (of which his mother was native) to make choice of himself: who being easily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily consented: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed seventy pieces of silver of their Idol Baal-borith, with which treasure he hired a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his seventy brethren, the sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Jasham the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury: all which he executed on one day; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such as it is, neither careth God (though all powerful, and whose revenges are without date, and for exalting) neither hath it respect to nature, which labourous the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beauty, which never dieth, and love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetheth every vice, and is it self the child and darling of Satan, looketh only towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how cruel and inhumane force) which may serve it: remembering nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or Religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. If a cruelly the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weakness of the undertakers, and rather praise the adventure, than fear the like success. It was the first kin that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his natural corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Devil, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as bestriding every age, and mans condition.

Jasham, the youngest of Gideons Sons, having escaped the present peril, fought by his best persuasions to alienate the Sedomites from the assisting of this merciless Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were virtuous, and whom Reason and Religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawful, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them, by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatness, the Fig-tree with its sweetness, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Example only, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Sovereignty. He also fore-told them by a Propheticall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Example, and consume the Cedars of Labanon.

Now (as it is an easy matter to call those men back whom rage without right led on) Gad the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sedom from the Service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entered the Town, and maltreated it; and in conclusion freed the Place, wherein their Idol Baal-borith was worshipped, and put the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Cattle or Tower of Tabor, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

Whilst Abimelech usurped the Government, the Lapythæ and Canana made war against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to lit them: in sum, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Indus, into the plains, those which had never seen horses before, Pelæus, thought their creatures comparable to men and horses; so did the Macedonians, when Ferdinand Cortes invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Issachar governed Israel 23 years, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22 years, who seems to be descended of Jair the son of Manasse, who in Moses's time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Manasse Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty years of those Cities which his Ancestor had recovered from the Amoritians. Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is argued, that during all their times Israel lived without disturbance, and in peace.

When Jair judged Israel, Prism began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Thim, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed to ransom, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the less. He married Hebe the Daughter of Ciffus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, wherof seventeen by Hebe, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helen the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

Thesius the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Aethra: but Phitarch in the Story of his life, finds him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Grecian Sea, between it and Asia the less, took name. For when Minos had maltreated the Athenians, so far as he forced them to pay him even of their sons every year for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monster Minotaur: because, belike the sons of Larum, which he began on Psiphia the Queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Thesius thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Country of that slavery occasioned for the death of Androgon, Minos his son.

And having plotted himself of Arcturus affection, who was Minos's daughter, he received from her a bottom of thred, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by means whereof having slain Minotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Ægeus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should eat a white fall in sign thereof, and not that mournful black fall under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus deſcrying the ſhip of Thelus with a black fall, did caſt himſelf over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægean.

One of the moſt famous acts of Thelus, was the killing of Seyon, who kept a paſſage between Megara and the Peloponneſian Iſlands, and threw all whom he ſeized into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Thelus terward he did like to Cecrop, by wreſtling, who uſed by that art to kill others. He ſlew rid the Country of Proerpes, who uſed to bend down the ſtrong limbs of two trees, and ſuſtained by cords ſuch, as he took part to one, and part to the other bough, and by the ſpringing up tare them aſunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other miſchievous thieves and murderers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazons, who after many victories and vaſtations, entered the Territory of Athens. Thelus having taken their Queen Hippolita priſoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phedra, falling in love, and reſuſing to abuſe his father's bed, Phedra perſwaded Thelus, that his ſon offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Thelus beſought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his ſons by ſome violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, ſent out his Sea-Calves, as Thelus paſſed by the Sea-ſhore, and ſo affrighted his horſes, as caſting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miſerable and undeſired deſtiny, when Phedra had heard of, ſhe ſtrangled her ſelf. After which, it is feigned, that Diana inſtigated Æſculapius to ſet Hippolitus his pieces together, and to reſtore him to life: which done, becauſe he was chaste, he led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field ſports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father fought his life, thinking to eſcape by Sea, was affronted therat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his paſſage and eſcape; which wounds, Æſculapius, to ſave ſome ſkillful Phyſician, or Chirurgeon, healed again: after which he paſſed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he much delighted. But of thoſe antient prophane Stories Plutarch ſaith well, that as Cosmographers in their deſcriptions of the World, where they find many vaſt places whereof they know nothing, fill the ſame, with ſtrange Beasts, Birds, and Fiſhes, and with Mathematical lines: ſo do the Grecian Hiftorians and Poets imbroilard and intermixe the Tales of antient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous diſcours. True it is, that Thelus did many great things in imitation of Heracles, whom he made his pattern, and was the firſt that gathered the Athenians, from being diſperſed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for deviling them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungovernable multitude, in the end baniſhed. Some ſay, per Oſtreacnum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on ſhells, which was a device of his own.

He ſlew Helen (as they ſay) when ſhe was fifty years old, from Apollonia, which City, Callor and Polux occurred, when they followed after Thelus to recover their ſiſter. Eratſtratus and Panſaninus write, that Thelus begot her with child at Argos, where the erected a Temple to Lutina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and ſo doth Ovid, Non tam longa ex ſpecto fructum tulit ille perennis, &c. The rape Æſchylus finds in the ſiſter of Jas, who governed Iſrael twenty two years, to whom ſucceeded Jopita or Jephtha, ſix years, to whom Iſazun, who ruled ſeven years, and then Habdon eight years: in whole time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Thelus had a child by her in the ſiſter of Jas, (at which time we muſt count her no leſs than fifteen years old: for the women did not commonly begin ſo young as they do now) he was then at leaſt two and fifty years old at the deſtruction of Troy: and when he was ſlitten by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eſchylus and Bonning, with Halicarnasſus, do in effect confeſs, that the City was entered and burnt in the ſiſter year of Dionopolis the ſiſter of Athens, the Succellor of Myſſianus, the ſiſter of Thelus, ſeventeen days before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans croſt the Helleſpont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next ſpring that they navigated into Silicia, where wintering the ſecond year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But S. Auguſtine hath otherwiſe, That when Polypides governed Sieyon; Meſſagers, Athens, Tautanes, Aſſyria; Habdon, Iſrael, in twenty ſhips, the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the ſtory of Troy at hand.

In Sieyonia, Phlegus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thelus. His ſuccellors, Adraſtus, who reigned four years, and Polypides, who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Jas: ſo alſo Meſſibus King of Athens and Arctus, who held a great part of Peloponneſus. In Aſſyria, during the government of theſe two peaceable Judges, Mirus, and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt, Anenophis, the ſon of Rameſus, and afterwards Anemanes.

SECT. VIII.

Of the War of Thebes, which was in this age.

In this age was the War of Thebes, the moſt antient that ever Greek Poet or Hiftorian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly againſt the Peripatetick) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo Remanque & Mandi, ſemperque eterna ſiſter,
Cur ſupra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troje,
Non alia aliſque res exierint Poete?

If all this World had no original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the ſiege of Thebes, or Troy laſt fall,
Why did no Poet ſing ſome elder War?

It is true, that in theſe times Greece was very ſavage, the Inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by other hand. Wherefore merchandize and ſtrange intercourſe they uſed little: neither did they plant many trees, or ſow more corn than was neceſſary for their ſuſtenance. Money they had little or none: ſo it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homor did write, who meaſures the value of Gold and Braſs by the worth in cattle: ſaying, that the golden Armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeces; and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by Land and Sea were common and without ſhame, and to ſeal Horſes or Kine was the uſual exerciſe of their great Men. Their Towns were not many, whereof thoſe that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycene, the principal City in Peloponneſus, was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the reſt were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in ſome ſmall Towns of that half Iſle of Peloponneſus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietneſs within their narrow bounds: as likewiſe did the Athenians, becauſe their Country was ſo barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will eaſily appear ſo ſuch as conſider, what Theophrastus the greateſt of their Hiftorians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Hiftory. Wherefore, as in theſe later times, idle Chroniclers uſe when they want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Froſts, or dry Summers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to read: ſo did they, who ſpoke of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Floods which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or elſe rehearſe Fables of men changed into Birds, of ſtrange Monſters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that favoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief ſumme of this is.

Oedipus the ſon of Laius King of Thebes, having been caſt forth when he was an Infant, becauſe an Oracle foretold what evil ſhould come to paſs by him; did afterwards in a narrow paſſage, contending for the way, ſlay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocasta, called by Homor, Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two ſons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſs of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his Parents, he underſtood the grievous murder and cure he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wiſe, (and Oedipus ther) did hang her ſelf. Some ſay, that Oedipus, having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his ſons, becauſe they ſuffered their father to be caſt out of the Town; and aided him not. Howſoever it were, his two ſons made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reign one year, and the other another year, and ſo by courſe rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obſerved. For when Polynices had after a years government reſigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (as according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the ſiſt year, he reſuſed to give over the rule to Polynices. Whereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adraſtus the ſon of Talaus then reigned, unto whoſe Palace coming by night, he was driven to ſeek lodging in an out-houſe, on the backſide.

There he met with Tydeus the ſon of Oeneas, who was fled from Calydon: with whom driving about their lodging, he fell to blows. Adraſtus hearing the noiſe came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time, perceiving in the ſhield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices, a Lion, he remembered an old Oracle by which he was adviſed to give his two Daughters in marriage to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly he did beſtow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deiſippe upon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their Countries. To this purpoſe levying an Army, and aſſembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was deſirous among others to carry Amphiarans the ſon of Ocleus a great Soothſayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarans, who is ſaid to have fore-ſeen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains ſhould eſcape, ſave only Adraſtus, did both bitterly reſuſe to be one in that expedition, and perſwaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyte the Wiſe of Amphiarans, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that he ſhould cauſe her Husband to aſſiſt him. The Soothſayer knowing what ſhould work his deſtiny, forbade his Wiſe to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her eye ſo precious a Jewel, that he could not reſuſe it. Therefore, whereas a great controverſie between Amphiarans and Adraſtus, was by way of compromise put unto the deſcion of Eriphyte, either of them being bound by ſolemn oath to ſtand to her appointment: the ordered the matter ſo, as a Woman ſhould that did love a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was far more eaſie to foreſee then avoid deſtiny, fought for ſuch comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his ſons, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their Mother, and make ſtrong war upon the Thebans.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his forces, of which, the ſeven chief Leaders were, Himſelf, Amphiarans, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in ſtead of whom ſome name Meſſippus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Etolian, and Parthenopius the Arcadian, ſon of Meſager and Asiantas. When the Army came to the Nemean Wood, they met a Woman, whom they deſired to help them to ſee Water: ſhe having a Child in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere he returned, a Serpent had ſlain the Child. This Woman was Hippolyte the Daughter of Thos the Lemnian, whom the would have ſaved when the Woman of the Iſle flew all the Males by conſpiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For ſuch her Piety, the Lemnian Wives did ſell her to the Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lyengrus Lord of the Country about Nemea, whoſe young ſon Opheleus, or Archemorus he did nurse and ſell, as is ſhewed before. When upon the Childs death the hid her ſelf for fear of her Maſter, Amphiarans told her Sons where they ſhould find her: and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had ſlain the Child, and in memory of the chance, did inſtitute ſolemn funeral games, called Nemean, wherein Adraſtus won the prize with his ſwift horſe Areon, Tydeus with the worlbrats, Amphiarans at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopius at ſhooting, and one Laudens in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheleus a Lacedemonian, ſome ſay by Heracles, when he had ſlain the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here ſet down.

From Nemea the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who

who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what nictle was in the Thobans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envy and malice of the people, who laid fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his return to the army, of which fifty he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the City as a Reporter and Witness of his Valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteoler was, they presented themselves before the City, and encamp'd round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which he like flood not far attunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger, could force muster up more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compass the Town, Adrius quartered before the Gate Honobider, Capaneus before the Oxygean, Tydus before Cronis, Amphiarus at Proitis, Hippomachus at Anachis, Parthenopans at Eledia, and Polynices at Holythia. In the mean season, Eteoler having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tydus the Southfayer, who promised Victory to the Thobans if Meneius the son of Cronus, a principal man of the City, would vow himself to be slain in honour of Mars the god of War. So full of malice and pride is the Devil, and so envious at his Creators glory, that he not only call length honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice, with all Divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understanding, and bewitched their Wills with ignorance and blind devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maids, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were most filled with superstition. But as that Argive more wife, for he was less impudent in cunning, though not less malicious in declining the continuance of such barbarous inhumanity. For King Dipharis in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Country rest contented with an Ox in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the Groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in stead of the living: yet among the salvages in the West Indies these cruel offerings have been practised of late Ages: which, as it is a sufficient argument that Satan's malice is only covered and hidden by this subtilty among civil people: so it may serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarous then reigning in Greece. For Meneius, as soon as he understood that his death might purchase Victory to his people, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himself before the gates of the City. Then was a battle fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the Walls, got up upon the Rampart: whence, when he fell, or was cast down, or (as Writers wave it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder bolt, the Argives fled. Many, on each part were slain in this battle, which caused both sides to decline that Eteoler and Polynices might try out the quarrel in single fight: where to the two brethren according, Row each other.

Another battle was fought after their death, wherein the sons of Athen behaved themselves very valiantly: Iphiclus oncof the sons, flew Hippomachus, which was one of the seven Princes: Parthenopans being another of the seven (who was said to have been so fair, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slain by Amphibius, or, as some say, by Periclymenus the son of Neptune: and the valiant Tydus, by Montippus: yet ere Tydus died, the head of Montippus was brought unto him by Amphiarus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter such remedy for his wounds, as should have made him immortal, refused to bestow it upon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortal, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrius and Amphiarus fled of whom Amphiarus is said to have been swallowed quick into the earth, near to the River Ismene, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcases, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrius escaped on his good horse Arian, and came to Athens: where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made supplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Cronus having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteoler, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Cronus Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrius, did send forth an Army under the conduct of Thesius, which took Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to sepulture: at which time, Eteoler the Wife of Capaneus threw her self into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little concerned the sons of those Captains which were slain at Thebes, that any less revenge should be taken of their Fathers death, than the ruine of the City: Wherefore ten years after, having levied Forces, Egeclus the son of Adrius, Dionides of Tydus, Pronander of Parthenopans, Stenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripulus of Macisus, marched thither under the conduct of Almeon, the son of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphydatus. Apollo promised Victory, if Almeon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle, he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountered by Laodamas the son of Eteoler then King of the Thobans (for Cronus was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battel, and slew Egeclus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Almeon. After this disaster, the Citizens began to desire composition: but in the mean time they conveyed themselves with their Wives and Children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Elicia. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entering in it, sacked it, threw down the Walls, and laid it waste: howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thersander the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the City from utter destruction, it is very likely: for he reigned there, and led the Thobans to the War of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

SECT.

SECT. IX.

Of Jephtha, and how the three hundred years which he speaketh of, Judg. 11. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronology about these times.

AFTER the death of Jair (near about whose time these things happened in Greece, and during whose Government, and that of Tolia, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Astartis, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoining, and embraced the Idols of the Arameans, of the Zidonians, Mosabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Arameans, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were incited to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born: but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of devilish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after Victory. And when he had disposed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammon's right, and fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the fear prevailing nothing, he began the war, and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forced them over the Mountains of Arabia, even to Minuth, and Ahal of the vineyards, Cities except hereofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he encountered, coming out of his house to meet him: which happened to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her self, and only desired two months time to bewail her Virginity on the Mountains of Gilead: because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more probable, which Barbeus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contended with Gilead. Jephtha hereupon enforced to defend himself against their fury, in the encounter, slew of them 42000 which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistines had an easy conquest of them all not long after. Jephtha, after he had judged Israel six years, died: to whom succeeded Ishazan, who ruled seven years: after him Elon was their Judge ten years: in all which time Israel had peace. Ephraim finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephtha's account of the times, Judg. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then possit the East side of Jordan 300 years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologists: there being found three places of Scripture touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of St. Paul, Acts 13: the third is that which is in the list of Kings. Jephtha here calleth the possession of Gilead for 300 years: St. Paul giveth to the Judge, as it seems, from the end of Jephtha to the last of Eli, 450 years. In the list of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were continued 480 years. To the first, Berosius hindeth Jephtha's 300 years to be but 266 years, to wit, 18 of Josias, 40 of Osbonid, 80 of Adad and Samgar, 40 of Deborah, 40 of Gideon, 23 of Abimelech, 23 of Tolia, and 22 of Jair: But Jephtha (if Berosius) putteth off the least a certain number for an uncertain: Sic in leat annum agi per recordandum, ex quo minus litter es de re memoris Iphthalis: St. de streghis (saith he) in meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundred years, since Israel possessed, or held, Cadmon on the contrary, finds more years than Jephtha named by 65; to wit, 365, whereof 71 were spent in Israel's captivity, at several times, of which (as Cadmon thinketh) Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71 of those years the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred years, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 365 years, besides the 71 years of captivity or affliction, to be added to Berosius his 266, he addeth also 28 years more, and so maketh up the sum of 365. These 28 years he findeth out thus: twenty years he gives to the Seniors between Josias and Obinid: and where Berosius alloweth eighteen years to Josias his government, Cadmon accounts that his rule lasted 26, according to Josaphat: whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melanthion 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28 years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years affliction (to wit 34 years of the 71) if we add them to the 266 years of Berosius, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300 years. Neither is it strange that Jephtha should leave out more than half of the years of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might exert against the 71 years, and say, that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Country in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300 years remembered by Jephtha, to be 306, which odd years, saith he, Jephtha omitteth. But because the years of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306, but do only compound 266, therefore doth Luther add to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea, which forty years of Moses added to the number which Berosius hindeth of 266, make indeed 366.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers judgment herein: for in the dispute between Jephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Beatus Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. more therefore restore these Lands again!

quickly, or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the times not to be accounted from Moser's departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was possit. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Balaad Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephtha's answer also confirmeth in these words: *When Israel dwelt in Helbon, and in her Tarnis, and in Aroer, and in her Tarnis, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300 years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300 years: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intent, that Israel had to possit it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me: for we do not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possitions.*

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and says, that this time of 300 years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephtha's narration: when he makes a brief recitation of Moser's whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: *But when Israel came up from Egypt, and therefore Moser's his 40 years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305 years: and not only the time in which Israel possit Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephtha's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others: to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480 years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of Saint Paul's and Jephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been figured. For first, touching Jephtha's three hundred years of possition of the East-side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites possited it, Sehon and Og had dispossited Moab and Ammon there of: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possition which they had, passed to Israel's: and so Jephtha might say, that they had possited those Countries 300 years, reckoning 266 years of their own possition, and the rest of the possition of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whole right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.*

The second place disputed is this of Saint Paul, 1. Cor. 13, that from the end of Jofua's, to the beginning of Samuel, there pass 450 years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Paulinus Krouschwinke, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moser, to the last year of Hebi, but 357 years: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6, is said to be 480 years.

Now so far as Saint Paul (as it seems) finds 450 years from the death of Jofua to the last of Hebi, and leaves but thirty years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40, for David who ruled 40, and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years: and that the foundation of the Temple was laid: therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of Saint Paul, to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death of Jofua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350 years (with

Luther) the Scripture in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, wherof the one signifieth 300, and the other 400, wrote Tetraesios, for Triaesios: 400 years for 300 years and 450 for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moser's death, he takes his account from the death of Jofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430 years: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Samson's years) 319, and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Samson's twenty years is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40 years, in which he thinks that Samson was oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Samson's time, they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111 years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319 years, which two sums put together, make 430 years. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450 years, he finds 20 years to make up Saint Paul's number, to have been spent after the death of Jofua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Gushan, or the election of Oboniel: which 20 years added to 430 make 450, according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24 of Jofua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the days of Jofua, and all the days of the Elders that over-lived Jofua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20 years, which make as before 450, according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty to this opinion, if here also the 20 years of the Seniors between Jofua and their years, and make Oboniel's 40 to begin presently upon the death of Jofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20 years less than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction apart from the years of the forty years of the Philistines oppressing the Israelites, they have 20 years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40 years of oppression all of them apart from Samson's 20: but Codoman, as is said, makes Samson's 20 to be the one half of the forty of the Philistines oppressions: so that if the 20 years of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to enforce) that the Philistines in any Inter-regnum, before Samson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40 years, besides the 20 while Samson was their Judge: and so the reckoning will come to 450 years from the end of Jofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Jofua and Oboniel: For, if the times of their afflictions be summed, they make 111 years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, 339, we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more profitable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350 for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350 years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moser: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the text. For these are Saint Paul's words: And about the time of forty years, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450 years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth Verse he speaketh of Moser, and of his years spent in the Wilderness, then in the nineteenth Verse he cometh unto the acts of Jofua: which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450 years, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moser, is wide of Saint Paul's meaning, so far as my weak understanding can piece it. The only inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcilable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were past 450 years between the end of Jofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 450 years between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficulty Codoman answereth, that these 480 years, 1 Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25 years after the beginning of Oboniel's government: from whence if we call the years of the Judges, with the years of servitude (which sums, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, mak 397 years) and so to these years add the 40 of Saul, and Samuel, and the 40 of David, and the 3 of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480 years. Neither is it hard, faith he, that the annus egressionis, sed finis, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so we find that things which were done forty years after they had set foot out of Egypt, as Psal. 114, When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Psal. 4. 45, These are the testimonies which Moses sang when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exinit, to be as much as quasi ex initio, or ab exinit finis: for if Junius, Danti 4. 45. do well recit quum ex initio, for in exinit, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exinit to be, postquam ex initio?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end until the 25 year after the victory of Oboniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time: at which time the Danites 18. at length feared themselves, as it is declared, Judg. 18. For doubting to this time the Expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephtha, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first of Kings 6. Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was then there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Oboniel lived all those 40 years of rest, of which Judg. 3. 11. to that by the 25 year after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Giddon did, he might have refused all Sovereignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25 year after Oboniel's victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it left round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of St. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanted all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded: it being such as the content of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Oboniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Oboniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law by Moser, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journeys with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can find no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or faith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most unproperly it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palestina did win Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may we then believe that enterprize performed 60 many years after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journeys end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the only guide for certain ages in sacred Chronology, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, wherof the very day and month are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and month wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by six hundred men, that robbed a Chappel by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident wherupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposed, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best fitted with his interpretation to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose Succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much, which I ended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the Apollie was so fur from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known and believed of the few to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40 years consumed in the Wilderness, wherof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their wanderings in the Wilderness about 40 years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the days of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450 years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339 years of the Judges; for this had been an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so good as laborious, to search out of this place that the Apollie did not here intend to teach, when the sum of 480 years is so expressly and purposely set down.

Now that the words of St. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronology, but must be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the Vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40 years to the reign of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forke the general opinion, when it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good mind, to help where the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of St. Paul were sufficiently justified by Bernardus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those days, that the 111 years of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339 years ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apollie would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the Vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; At si vere four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it to be indeed, and therefore dis-joynes the members to make the account even. In so doing he defendeth himself against a notable Text, wherupon all Authors have builded, (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth call up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's Temple, not omitting the very month it self.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his own interpretation of St. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find some new explication for that which is of it self most plain, and to examine his own conjecture upon a place that is full of controverſie. Thus by expounding after a strange Method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loſeth himſelf in thoſe ways wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one ſhould urge him to give reaſon of theſe new opinions, he muſt needs anſwer, that Obſcurity could not govern above 25 years, becauſe then was the taking of Laiſh; at which time there was no King in Iſrael; That the Danites muſt needs have taken Laiſh at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple, to any action that might be termed the coming of Iſrael out of Egypt, without excluding the years of ſervitude; And that the years of ſervitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe he himſelf ſhould have ſpent his time vainly, in ſeeking to pleaſure St. Paul with an expolition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the decision of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our ſtory. To the time of Jephtha are referred the death of Heracles, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Meneſlaus, reigning then in Sparta, & his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Iſhan from which time, if the war of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had fix years to prepare themſelves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa præparatio belli celerem offeri videtur: That a long preparation begets a ſpeedy victory: for the Greeks conſumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it ſeems, was entered, ſackt, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy was taken, which was in the ſixth year of Habdon, Æneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after he had been the Father of 40 ſons, and 30 grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40 years of Iſrael's oppreſſion by the Philiftines (of which Judge, 13. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Jair, and ended with the laſt of Habdon: I ſee no reaſon for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cauſe of quarrel againſt Jephtha, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philiftines had held them in ſervitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000 armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppreſt: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought againſt the Philiftines with ſo powerful an Army for their own deliverance, than againſt their own brethren the Iſraelites? but Æneas being overthrowen, it ſeemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore theſe 40 years muſt either be ſupplied elſewhere, as in the time of Samſon, and afterward: or elſe they muſt be referred to the Inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Iſrael by Samſon, ſuch as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the War of Troy.

SECT. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the antient Poets, how they have observed hiſtorical truth.

THe War at Troy, with other ſtories hereupon depending (becauſe the ruine of this City, by moſt Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judg of Iſrael whom in the laſt place I have mentioned) I rather choſe here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal deſcent of their Princes, than to break the ſtory into peices by rehearſing a-part in divers years, the diverſity of occurrents.

The Hiſtory of the antient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tæcer and Dardanus were the two Founders of that Kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineſcius thinks) took from Beroſus, it is the more probable: if Æneius borrowed it of him, then it reſts upon the authority of Virgil, who ſaith thus:

Gives it their Captains name, and calls it Italy:
This feat belongs to us; hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of your ſtock, Jafius,

*Atque equidem memini (ſama eſt obſcurior annis)

Some old Auruncans, I remember well, (Though time have made the ſame obſcure) would tell

Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
From hence he came into Phrygia did ſiege
And leaving Tuſſaine (where he earſt had place)
With Corytus did fall to Samothrace:
But now introyhized he ſits on high,
In golden Palace of the ſtarry Sky.

But contrary to this, and for many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineſcius thinks that theſe names, Tæcer, Tæcer, & Thraceer, are derived from Tæcer or Thæcer the Son of Japhet: and that the Dardanians, Myſians, and Aſianians, mixt with the Trojanians, were Germane Nations, deſcended from Abheſax, the Son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Aſſinien in Aſia, took name. That Abheſax gave name to thoſe places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Aſianians think, that many others did in aftertimes paſs into Europe: that the name of Tæcer came of Tæcer, the conjecture is ſomewhat hard. Concerning Tæcer, whereas Halicarnæſus makes him an Aſiatican, I find none that follow him in the ſame opinion. Virgil (as is before ſhewed) reported him to be of Crete, whoſe authority is the more to be regarded, becauſe he had good means to find the truth, which is it probable that he care fully fought, and in this did follow, ſeeking it no way concerned Auguſtus (whom other, while he did flatter) whether Tæcer were of Crete or no. Reineſcius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diadorus, and others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Samander and Idæa Lord of the Country, not founder of the City; and his Daughter or Neceſſe Baria was the ſecond Wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineſcius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his Daughter Electra to Corythus, or Coritus: and that theſe were parents to Chryſis, firſt wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwiſe, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the Son of Electra by Jupiter which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and Wife to Coritus King of Hætoris, to whom the late Jafius,

In the main Sea the Ile of Crete doth lie
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
There is a mount Idæ there in fruitful Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities ſtand Thence (if I follow not miſtaken ſtance)
Teucer the eldeſt of our grand-fires came
To the Rhæusian ſhores: and reigned there,
Ere yet fair Ilium was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they fought.

In lowly Vallies. Hence Cybele rites were brought:
Hence Corybantiæ Cymbals did remove;
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it ſeemeth by Virgil, who followed ſurely good authority, that Teucer firſt gave name to that Country, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built: by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the ſame book the ſpeaks thus:

all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the World; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hefione, King Priamus his Sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel Man, seeing his own Son Troas durst not come in his sight, after the War of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, only because his Brother Ajax (which Troas could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so, that Hefione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her Brother would seek to take her from her Husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born Children, which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hefione, but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to do that which in those days was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks; as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steal Women and Cattel, if they could be by strong hand or power get them: and having slain them, either to kill them away in some far Country, or keep them to their own use. So did Theseus and Pyrythos attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were to common, that none durst inhabit near unto the Sea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no less lawful than merchandise: wherefore Theseus, the Father of Helen, confiding in the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her Woomen, who were most of the principal Men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn oaths, that they were taken from her Husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his Daughter, who chose Menelaus Brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Theseus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping: for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Islands: he was also rich in Money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own Ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

This did all Greeks, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two Brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour of that great enterprise: take Arms against the Trojans. The Greek Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200 sayl, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build Ships with decks: only they used (as Thucydides saith) small Ships, meet for robbing on the Sea, the least of which carried fifty Men, the greatest 120, every Man (except Captains) being both a Mariner and a Soldier. By this proportion it appears that the Greek Army consisted of 100000 Men or thereabout. This was the greatest Army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of that Army doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the City, not the tenth part of this number; as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads: but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misra, and the greatest part of Asia the less, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memon out of Affrica (though some think out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

SECT. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helen's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Wherefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to trial of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy, who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his House. What answer the Trojans made hereunto is uncertain, Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helen, being driven by foul weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Ptolemus then King of Egypt finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her Husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greek demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded; and thereupon made the War which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his Wife of Ptolemus, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Proclus) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homers speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed that he made for pleasure, and if he were driven by contrary Winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such Winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any Port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see to many miseries befall him, during the war, and to many of his Sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was his Son to the Kingdom (for Hector was elder), nor equal in vertue to many of the rest. Besides it may seem that Lucian spake not more pleasantly then truly, when he said that Helen, at the War of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that the wife of Silvers to Castor and Pollux, the and Pollux being said by some to have been twins) who failed with the Argonauts, having Tela-

mon the Father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hefione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a Principal Commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, it is to that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haft towards Troy: at which time Calchus (whom some say to have been a runagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homers) filled the Captains, and all the Host with many troublefome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needful here to be disputed. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devil, which waits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchus also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were removed; and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise: under the command of Agamemnon who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phoenix, Ajax the sons of Telamon, I-domenus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thersites; Ulysses, Menelaus the son of Petrus, Captain of the Athians; Dionides the son of Tydemus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamides, Alicalaphus, and Jalmenus; the sons of Mars, who had failed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the son of Peas, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Chalco said, that the City could not be taken, Ajax the son of Oilius, Peneles, Theas, Eumelus, Tylandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sibecus, Teipolonus the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sons of Aesculapius; Epous, who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the Town was taken; and Protesilans, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

SECT. IV.

Of the Ads of the Grecians at the siege.

These, and many other of less note, arriving at Troy found such sharp entertainment, as might easily privide them to think that the war would be more than one years work. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilans, whom Hector slew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans; Gave only that by their numbers of men, they were ground enough to encamp themselves in as ap-pearch in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallness of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to fend some part of their men, to labour the ground in Chorone to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the Town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat, if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Horace commendeth as very credible, the report of Horodius, that the Greeks did not lay before Troy the first nine years; but only did bear up and down the Seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves; and so by waiting the Enemies Country, did block up the Town, until when they returned not, until the fatal time drew near when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them; and therefore fitting upon an high Tower (as Homers tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is Hom. 12. like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the Town 10 many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Horodius, the difference is not much, the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by Land and by Sea: the others that the whole army did spend the time in waiting the Sea-coasts. Neither do the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many Towns and Islands waited, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great pellence arose among the Greeks: which Homers saith, that Apollo felt in revenge of his Priest's Daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go for any ransom: but Horodius interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sun, who raised pestilential Fogs, by which the Army was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the Camp was over-pelted with those who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having all grounded their Ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and to the rest of the chief Captains in order; when the South-layer Calchus had wilfully that Agamemnon Woman should be restored to her Father Apollo's Priest, so that the pellence might cease; then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say that he alone would not lose his part of the spoil, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles denied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to fend forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having lent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money; wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in Homers), or for love of himself and his Sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they waited the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when when Hector issued out of the Town, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of Men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Hector, Paris, Diopimus, Helenus, and the other Sons of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his Sons Polidamus, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the Sons of Panthrus, besides Rhefus, who was slain the first night of his arrival; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the Greeks were many battles fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tomb of King Ilus upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their Ships: at which time Ajax the Son of Telamon, with his Brother Teucer, were in a manner the only Men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battle (for so Antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles's Troops: relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a Man, to strip him, and hale away his body, not restoring it without ransom, if he were one of Mark. Of the vulgar, little reckoning was made: for they fought all on Foot, lightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains, who rode not upon Horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three Horses, which were guided by some truly followers of theirs, which drove up and down the Field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftness of their Horses, presenting themselves where need required, threw first their javelins, and then alighting, fought on Foot, with Swords and Battle-Axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were Helmets, Breast-plates, Boats of Brass, or of Metal, and shields commonly of Leather Plated over. The offensive were Swords and Battle-Axes at hands and Stones, Arrows or Darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their Armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heaviest, also that from them they might throw their javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which Weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the Field: wherfore they were often driven to return to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of Armour they had little change or none: every Man (speaking of the chief) carried his own complement, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped; or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his Armour, which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could encounter the fight: wherof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his Concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next Battle Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chased three times about the Walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the City (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the Rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that fight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in such an extremity, would have forbore to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body as the custom then was, but boring holes in his Feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tied him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the Field, selling the dead body to his Father Priamus for a very great ransom. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenge'd; for he was shortly after slain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer says in the Secon Gate: or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the Daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her Brethren: and his body was ransomed (as Lyophras saith) at the self same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proof given of her Valour, was slain by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles.

SECT. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Book of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the Reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many Worthy Persons on each side, the City was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the Treason of Eneas and Antenor, or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common Fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some saith that upon one of the Gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the Image of a Horse, and that the Greeks entering by that Gate, gave occasion to a report, that the City was taken by an artificial Horse. It may well be, that with some wooden Engine, which they called a Horse, they either did batter the Walls as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ram: or scaled the Walls upon the fudden, and so took the City. As for the hiding of Men in the hollow body of a wooden Horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were enclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon): or they might have left it a few days without the City (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the Town, and break down their Walls upon the fudden to do it): by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing

SECT. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

issuing forth, unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this Horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the Town through any of the Gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their Wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest, that the including of so many principal men was altogether needless, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the Army, so that the surprising of any Gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his History of Africa, differing from this War, saith that the Greeks did both batter the Walls with a Wooden Engine; and were also let into the City by Antenor, at the Secon Gate: the Townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the Fleet of the Greeks had hoisted Sail, and was gone the day before to the Iles of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the City was betrayed, the Books of Dares, and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the time that were by them written, it may be suspected, for surely they who have made mention of these Writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in most points to these two Authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that War made against the common report, had it so: been that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnancy to the other Authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of Men slain in this War, which Dares and Dyctis say to have been above 60000 on the Trojan side, and more then 80000 of the Greeks, it is a report merely fabulous: for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their Army and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat less than 1200 sail, and the Army therein transported over the Greek Seas, not much above 100000 Men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of Men to extol the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause, both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that served in the War, and Virgil with others, were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their City, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Albanians long after in the War which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Melanthus the Son of Peleus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian Army before Troy: wherupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yield unto Golon, King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200 good fighting ships, and 30000 Men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the World, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy; all difficulties or unlikelihoos in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanians in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Eneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Country adjoining, by Antenor: the Chalcians planted in Euboea by Helenus, the Son of King Priamus. To which Hellenus addeth, that the Politeny of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

Concerning the Greeks, they taied as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thesides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borders from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrival: others were debarr'd from the Sovereignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Army, which weakened much by the calamities of that long War, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into so many peices, under several Commanders, nor very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set Sail, Agamemnon and his Brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the Fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them failed to the Isle of Tenedos: where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon: others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole Fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perfwaded in hate.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Oristes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoteus, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salonians, and Philoteus at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his Wife, and by the Adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdom. Meneleus wandering long upon the Seas, came into Aegypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the matherhip of his own house. All the rest, either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and lain to seek out new habitations.

Ajox the Son of Oileus was drowned: Taueus fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Dannus, who was Lord of the Japiger in Apulia; some of the Lorians were driven into Africa, others into Italy, all the East part wherof was called Magna Grecia, by reason of so many Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that Coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Grecian Ladies, whose Husbands had been at the War of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judg of Israel, whom Samson, after a vacancy or Inter-regnum for certain years, succeeded.

respect of the blessing of God, both to Abraham, that his seed should multiply as the Stars of Heaven, and the finds of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Interests, and multiply, &c. and in Duteronomy the seventh, There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service: to which he delivered him even from the dug. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five shekels, and between five years and twenty, for twenty shekels: so was it not required by the Law, that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the Writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was given, and yet did Moser account himself such a one; as in the 18th of Duteronomy, The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as before time in Israel, when a man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go in the old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moser, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision: not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Caldean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Matpah or Mispha, seated on a hill in Benjamin near Juda: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

The Philistines taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of War at Mispha, in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Army, and marched towards the City: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with fear, and with the memory of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistines were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moser, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at the first entrance into Arabia;) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistines: according to the prophecy of Hanna, Samuel's Mother, The Lord's adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall be thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistines were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which, Samuel erected a Monument in memory of his happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus calls Lapidum fortis: Samuel, Ebenzer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in the possession of the Philistines, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assailed from divers parts at once; having the Philistines towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Idumeans on the South. The elite being thus fortified, Samuel for the sake of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elsewhere said.

* Plato reports of Namur, the second King of Rome, that when he was sacrificing, it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing dismayed, but said, Ego autem sacrifico, or I am sacrificious.

and is so still, by free consent of the subjects towards their Princes. For nift he makes them know that the King will use their sons in his own service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotiers, and Foot-men; which is not only not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best quality to command for the King in his Wars; and to till the ground no less proper and pertaining to those that are thence bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dress meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, He will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive tree, and give them to his servants; with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirm that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination continue this Text farther otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Sovereigns hand. The former opinion is grounded on that upon that place of government from Judges to Kings; and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many wives, covetousness, and the like, he commanded that the Kings which were to reign over Israel, should write the Law of Duteronomy, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his days in his Kingdom, and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Laws of God, in the same book written. For it is said, That which is left and right shall thou follow, that thou mayst live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much less lawful to take the vineyard it self from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as do warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper unto them, to take at will anything from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawful for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sons: and again, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raise up you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, levered from piety (because it is accountable to God only) will do in the future. And hercof we find the first example in Abish, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righteous judgment. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsely accused, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of Law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the Kings, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himself: Possit me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustinus is very true: Summa Legis inconvicta, non est inconvicta: simulata equitas, non est equitas: sed dupliciter peccatum in quo est iniquitas & Simulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity and dissimulation. Such in effect is their dissipation, who think this place to contain the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchie; which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much less here to infer. Only thus much I will say, that if practice do shew the greatness of authority, even the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so eyed by any laws, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their own Princes, and of their own brethren to be slain without any trial of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed to him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not only foretold by Moser in Duteronomy, but perceived by Isaac in this Scripture: The scepter shall not depart from Juda, &c. It was Gen. 49. 10. 11. also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For he was not only assured that his issues should number equal the stars in heaven, but that Kings should proceed of him: which state seeing it is traced from the pattern of his sole, who is Lord of the Universe; and the excellency thereof in respect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed that civil war Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed upon each other: in what miserable servitude they lived for many years: and when it faced best with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Country. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan: the Philistines the Sea-coasts; and the Jebusites, Jerusalem it self, till David's time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but he maltreated and subjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations, to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they fought to be cleared from the sons of Samuel, they became deaf to all the persuasions; and threats which Samuel used, insisting upon this point, that they would have a King both to judge them and defend them: whereunto Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every man to his own City and abiding.

SECT. II.

Of the election of Saul;

AFTER that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Matpah, he forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present unto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sepphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having waned

SECT. I.

Of the deliberation to change the Government into a Kingdom.

But when age now began to overtake Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of so careful a government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his sons, Joad and Abijah, who judged the people at Bethel, at Judah, the very utmost towards the South of Judea. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no less removed from the justice and virtue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousness, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain; to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and Judgment to the best Chapman. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the crooks of his own, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also lead them to the War, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossoms promised to yield fruit no less bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much revered, but by the choice of a King. In a censure of to great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsel from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his own Sons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his left arguments to deter them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath been, and dred divers days to seek his fathers Affes, at length, by the advice of his kinsmen, travelled towards Ramoth to find a Secor or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beatts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who fought an Als and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jabro; and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beatts; and changed his sheep-hook into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel. So Jahn and Janes were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignity that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours; but permanent and everlasting in Gods everlasting Kingdom.

When Saul was entered into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the king, whom he expected, and stayed his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Saul, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Saul in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much less knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Saul in what part of the City the Lord dwelt; Saul answered, that himself was the man he sought, and prayed Saul to go before him to the high place, where all Saul were invited, according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the kingdom, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should encounter him by Rachels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Affes were found, and that his Fathers cars were changed from the fear of losing his beatts, to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet three other men in the plain of Labor; then a company of Prophets; and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophecy with them; and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men induced with spiritual gifts, were not of the mit and most-reverenced number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their Kings and wrought miracles, of which number were Moses, Jehna, Saul, and after them Gad, Nathan, Abias, Elias, Elisear, Esay, Jeremy, and the rest to these Prophets, & faith St. Chrysostom, Omnia tempora pertransit, preterita, presentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom St. Paul speaketh, 1 Cor. 14. 14. who enriched with spiritual gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpeh, Saul assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had passed between him and Saul: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeh, the general opinion is, that the Lord was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of Priest, wearing that mystery upon his breast when he asked the counsel of the Lord. But the calling of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Paufanias, and others, have remembered divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other Nations; as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called Divitory; the Third, Divinatory, and unto one of these three, all may be reduced, all which kinds, however they may seem chanciful, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Saul former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Josephus confess it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Saul, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least Tribe. But Saul enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Saul made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and gloried for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was, of whom Saul, to avoid sedition, took no notice.

SECT. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victory.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdom, but that he received knowledge, that Nabab King of the Ammonites, prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephtha, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephtha's time, yet they never perished themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slain 34000 of their men of War: and besides had used great care and policy that they neither have no Smiths to make their swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Benjaminites, and places adjoining, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000 and therefore in the present time, even upon this occasion they were to enlarge their Dominions over their borders: Jabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were emboldened against Jabes Gilead, Saul in respect of their weakness: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joining with them against the Benjaminites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjaminites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonites might flatter himself with the opinion, that

SECT. IV.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Wars with the Philistines and Ammonites, which caused his final rejection.

Jonathan with his small Army or Regiment that attended him, taking time of advantage, besieged a Garrison of Philistines: the same, as some think, which Saul pass by, when he came from Ramath, when he was first anointed by Saul, which they think to have been Carith-jerim: because a place where the Philistines had a Garrison, 1 Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Carith-jerim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have been at Gibeah in Benjamin near Gibeah, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. However, by this it appears that the Philistines held some strong places, both in the times of Saul, and of David, within the Territory of Israel: and now being greatly irritated by this surprise, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and six thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Maabon or Meabon, a City of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Jerusalem, and in the middle of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were stricken in to great a fear, as some of them fled themselves in the caves of the Mountains; others with sword 20000 men of ordinary, and many other people, slain at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Jehna, when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Sauls appointment was to attend the coming of Saul seven days: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place, 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to execute the office which appointed not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering, and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiastical Laws of the Hebrews, and Gods Commandments: others expound the word abstain, in this place, by abstain per Sacerdotem, and so make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandment, in not staying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. 10. 8. Secondly, a disobedience or mistrust in Gods help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Saul, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Saul reprehended most sharply in committing his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Saul to do so, from God himself: at which time an also Saul feared not to let him know, that the Kingdom should be conferred to another (a man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his volatility.

After this, Saul and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his army, found it to consist of 600 men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that fled, there was not any that had either sword or spear, but Saul and his son Jonathan only. For the Philistines had not left them any Smiths in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul, came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Jabes Gilead with 300 and thirty thousand men, if there had not now been any any iron weapon to defend themselves withall, save only in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his son. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsman carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites only stiles to sharpen and amend such stuff as served for the Plough, and for neought else: yet that they had some kind of arms, it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but only that there was not any found amongst those 600 soldiers, which flayed with Saul after Sammels departure: and it is enough that when Sammels had sharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forsook him, having but 600 remaining of his 3000 ordinary soldiers, and of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Sammels arrived.

With this small troop he held himself to his own City of Gibeah, as a place of more strength, and better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to pass that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Sammels much had been done against them. For the victories of Sammels were not got by sword or spear, but by thunder from Heaven: and when these crafts-men were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvel if they could not in a short peace under Sammels, be retrained again. For this tyranny of the Philistims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Sammels: and yet under him is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their Artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nebuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Judea: Dionysius in Sicily, and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons, in part, the Israelites might repair in Gilgal, for over Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used, and their present necessity ministered unto them, to wit, clubs, bows, and slings. For the Benjamites excelled in casting stones in slings: and that these were the natural weapons, and the first of all nations, it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Ikkegah, That they were equipped with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with slings, and with a sling it was, that David himself slew the Giant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard terms, the Philistims having parted their army into three troops, that they might spoil and destroy many parts at once. Jonathan, strengthened by God, and followed with his Elgiens only, scaled a mountain, whereon a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their army (as may be gathered by the success) being encamped in the plain adjoining. And though he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of derision, called up to his enemies: yet he so behaved himself, as with the assistance of God, he flew 20 of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed together. In which confusion, fear, and jealousy, they slaughtered one another in fear of enemies: whereupon those Hebrews which became of their party, because they feared to be spoiled by them, took the advantage of their distraction, and flew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himself taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Isra- elites that thronged themselves in Mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that prophetic in Dante's story fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them, ten thousand.

This done, the small Army of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his son Jonathan, being infected with extreme labour and emptiness, tasted a drop of honey in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan, seems to have reduced, unto the Philistims remembrance, their former overthrow, likewise miraculous in the days of Sammels: so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns, all his bordering enemies: namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. Hethen assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000 men, and receiving the commandment of God by Sammels, he invited Amalek, waiting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petrea, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Hulath towards Tigris unto Suez, which bordereth Egypt: in which war he took Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Sammels to follow this Nation without compassion, because they mist of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Mose's time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the bell of the beasts, and spoil of the Country, with presence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Sammels now a second time make him know that God would call him from his royal estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and, as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Sammels, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to enjoin the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all inexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven. For the cruelty of Agag, with the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were over-wearied, faint, sick, and aged people, was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation, above 400 years afterward: and now he was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himself having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Sammels witness: As thy sword hath made other women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among other women: at which time Sammels did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul until the day of his death.

SECT.

SECT. V.

Of the occurrences between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOW while Sammels mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sons of Israhel: which Sammels (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform: till it pleased God to direct him, how he might avoid both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Sammels knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom, he sought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do those men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting thereon that God hath given them, do no other wise avoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as men suspected in the opinion of fate or destiny, neglecting either to beg counsel at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerful God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Sammels, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious ways of the world.

Of the sons of Israhel, Sammels, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliah the first born: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength: yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God looks not on man's face, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing other like brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock: for him the Lord said to Sammels, Arise, and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Sammels departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this, that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, overcome in battle by the Philistims.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sinned still and forbore to give impediment to his prosperous courtes, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with advantage: if ever opportunity should have their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the quality of their Soldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equal, if not superior to Israel. The success of their former wars had, for the most part, been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late difficulties, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes: as to a tempest hapning by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Army, possessed with a needless fear, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so near to the Army, which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battle, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in grofs, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to pass the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides: especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they fought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroak from heaven were to be feared. Goliath of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertook to deie the whole Host of Israel, provoking them with despightful words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hands offering condition, that the party vanquished in his Champion, should hold it self as overcome in grofs, and become vassal unto the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Sammels by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance upon public notice of the people. For no man durst expose himself to encounter the great strength of Goliath, until David (sent by his father on an errand to the Camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victory, without other arms, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Giant, and after with his own sword strook off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yielded themselves as subjects to the Conqueror, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistims were lost, or at least discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victory, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, he then became a cruel Tyrant, faithless, and irreverent. Because the High Priest Ahimelech had given David in his necessity with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his own conquest, taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doug murdered this Ahimelech and 83 Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the City, and smote with the edge of the sword both men and women, both child and 18. Jeckiah, both Oni and Ahi, and Sheph. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattel, contrary to the Commandment and Ordinance of God, both by Mose and Sammels, had not now any mercy in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of Israel. Yes, he would have slain his own son Jonathan, for pitying and pleading David's innocency: as also once before, for raising the honey, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unexcusable continuation. The companions of cruelty are, breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former he shewed in denying David's daughter, whom he had promised him; and again in taking her away from him to whom he had given her: also in that, when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsel of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas, when he sought counsel from God, he had been always victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this success followed, that both himself, and his three sons, with his near and faithful servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his body with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walls of Beisath; and there had remained till they had found burial in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the grateful Goliath of Tub, stole their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Sammels, 40 years, and by himself after Sammels 20 fore Rome was built: though elsewhere in his Chronology he notes that some place him in time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other Ages. In his Evangelical Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affrican he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homér lived, he reckoneth many other Greek Writers more ancient than Homér; as Linus, Philommon, Epinimides, Pheonius, Arifteur, Orpheus, Museus, Thomyer, Amphion, and others.

M m years,

Now whether Homér or Hefiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius says the elder, that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homér preceeded Hefiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hefiod of an elder time than Homér. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned Fables was first born: but he finds that they lived together some certain years, wherein he confirms himself by an Epigram, written upon a Trevit, and left by Hefiod in Holicon.

Corneilius Nepos reports that they both lived 160 years before Rome was built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about * 140 years after the fall of Troy. * Euthymius finds them both 200 years after Troy taken, in the time of Aeschus the son of Pellus, King of Theffaly. For my self, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty, and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dates of time. For, the curiosity of this man is no less ridiculous, than the inquisition which he begins his Iliads with the word Méa, as perhaps containing some great mystery. In devotion whereof Lucian faining himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homér, there asked him the cause why he began his book with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to do.

It seemeth that Seyer, or, after Macrobius, Senenir ruled Egypt at this time: for Thyphodorus was his Successor, who preceded Aphrus, Father in law to Solomon.

About the end of Sumer government, or in the beginning of Dauids time; according to Cassiodorus, Enf. 10, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latins, Sylvis then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that Famous State of Troy, which fell 100 years before Dauid's time, there were many other changes in the middle part of the World, not only by reason of those Northern Nations: but their sprung up somewhat nearly together, six Kingdoms into greatness, not before created. In Italy that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achei. In Arabia, Syria, Saba, and Damascur, the Assads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered the Form of Government, began to flourish under Kings, of which Dauid, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by entechance of times had subjected the Judeans, corrupted their Religion, and held them under in a most abject and grievous slavery to wit, the Edumæans, Mogites, Ammonites, Midianites, Israhites, and the rest of Arabians, with the Philistines, Gethurites, Moabites: all which acknowledged Dauid for their Sovereign Lord, and payed him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

OF DAVID.

SECT. I.

Of Dauids estate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet only deliged King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of Fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both Armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the son of Saul, that he loved him as his own soul: Inasmuch as when Saul sought to perfwade his son that Dauid would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause; Jonathan could never be perfwaded, never forsook, nor ever wearied from the care of Dauid's life, and well doing. It was not long after this signal act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he was become as his household servant, and his Esquire, or Armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil spirit, was advised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp: whereby it was thought that he might find ease, which came to pass accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of command among the men of War. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed weary of good affection, and sought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moved only through envy of his Vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a spear at Dauid that was then playing on his Harp, to do him ease.

Confutius remembereth one Afclapius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzy, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony. Since, in his third book of Anger, witnesseth. But the madness of Saul came from the cause of caufes: and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yielded unto that Musick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto Dauid the command over 1000 Souldiers to confront the Philistines withall. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promised him his Daughter Meroth to Wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to Dauid his younger Daughter Michol, but with a condition, tion, to present him with an hundred fore-skins of the Philistines: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistines would take Dauid's head, than heretofore skins. This hoping failing, when as now Dauid's Victories began new fears and jealousies in Saul, he practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his own house, but Michol his Wife delivered him. So Dauid fought Samuel at Ramath, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Ahimelech, then to Adriel the Philistine, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himself, he was forced to counterfeit both simplicity and distraction.

But being ill assured among the Philistines, he covered himself in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his Kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himself in the desert of Ziph, Maon, and the Hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Saul's Garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his Master Saul was known to persecute him.

Of Achis, Dauid obtained * Siglag in Simon, pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way, and trook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to complain upon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawn blood of his own Nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoned Dauid to assist him, who diffembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistines Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siglag. At his return he found the Town burnt, his two Wives, with the Wives and Children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hercupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

This Army of the Philistines commanded by Achis, encountered Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three Sons were slain. The news, with Saul's Crown and Bracelets, were brought to Dauid at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amalek, by a Man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsely) that himself at Saul's request had slain him. Dauid, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to be slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withal. Otherwile it followeth not that every Man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confesso reorum non habendo ei pro explorato crimine, nisi approbato alia iustitiam religionem congruenti. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unless some other proof inform the Confidence of the Judge. For a Man may confess those things of himself, that the Judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confitetur, & in cap. de panis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Gloss reconcile these two places in this sort: Siquis in iudicio sponte de seipso convitetur, & postea manet in confessione, id est latius. If any Man in judgement do confess of himself, of his own accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable: for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befel him being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but flit up sorrow, and move compassion in the heart of Dauid.

The victory which the Philistines had gotten, was so great, that some Towns of the Israelites, beyond the River of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the enemy who took possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seem strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistines, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seek to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seems, that the civil War immediately breaking out between Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Judea was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an ease victory over both: and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present left by for doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation: but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

SECT. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reign, and the War made by Abner for Isobeth.

AFTER the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, sought to advance Isobeth (or Jehobab, according to Isophorus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Israel: for Michol the first Son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner and Isobeth, Dauid made a defensive War, till Abner past Jordan, and entered the border of Juda: at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isobeth remaining in Geth, and Dauid in Hebron. The Armies encountered each other near Gibeon, where it seemeth that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that combat between the Luedenemians and the Argivæ, remembered by Hecataeus, 360 being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were only left unslain. The like trial by a farles number was performed by the Horatii and Curatii, for the Romans and Latines. The time challenge Goliath the Philistines made, whom Dauid slew: a custom very ancient. Edward the third offered the like trial in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part in this War of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, 10 of many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valour was to equal, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory.

But the quarrel laid not here for the Army of Juda preff Abner in grofs, and brake him. Three hundred and sixty Men of Abner's companions were slain, and but twenty of Juda: whereof Asabel the Brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abner's perswasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounded him to death with the stroke of his spear. For though Asabel were an excellent Foot-man, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Isophorus reporteth, contended not only with Men, but with horses: and hoped to have gotten great fame if he could have mastered Abner (who as Asabel perfwaded himself, had by being overthrownd and flying away, lost his courage) yet here it tell us true, Thas therace is not to the swift.

That this civil War lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention drew longer and therefore thematter rather fill in dispute, and some of the Rabbins conceive that Ishbosheth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the War as yet continuing a longer time. For Ahner held for the party of Ishbosheth at first, and till such time as there grew jealousy between him and Ishbosheth for Saul's Concubine: neither did the death of Ishbosheth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Ahner it happened, the same doth certainly appear.

SECT. III.

Of the death of Ahner slain by Joab, and of Ishbosheth by Rechab and Baanah.

Ahner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered, for Joab could not endure a companion in David's Favour, and in the commandment of his forces by which he was grown so powerful, as David forbore to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth himself, I am this day weak, and sleep Men, the Sons of Zerviah, betwixt hand for me. In this four David complained after Ahner's death; and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation; *Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his father's house: and let them be subject to Ulcers, to the Leprosy, to Lemneth, to the sword, and to poverty, &c.* For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have endangered David's estate, Ahner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes; not yet reconciled. This mischief therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Ahner held, being General of the Men of War, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were fain to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversity; wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his own kinsman, and the Kings, upon the same quarrel, taking it in high disdain to see him joyed with himself as Captain of the host of Juda; much less could he brook a superior: and such a one as had slain his brother, and been beaten himself in Battle. But however Joab did late or despise Ahner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great Man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming that he dyed not like a Fool, nor a Man vanquished: But as a Man fallen before wicked Men, so (saith he) didst thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and virtue in him, whom a stronger hand destroyed unawares, or whom subtilty in fire true bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Ishbosheth meant to have dealt with Ahner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of this estate, and with him all Israel were posselt with great fear: in so much as two of Ishbosheth's own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Ishbosheth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekites lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Ishbosheth, being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent.

SECT. IV.

Of the flourishing time of David's Kingdom, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrows given to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

When David was now established in the Kingdom, his first enterprise was upon the Philistines, who in defiance of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as it is thought) manned their Walls with the blind and lame of their City; which David soon after entered, all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion, which was afterward the City of David, he became Lord of Jerusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Philistines, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moser and Jephtha and after them almost 400 years. There are who expound this place, otherwise: Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Philistines; others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac and Jacob; the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angels, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self, I take it with Jephtha, that they armed their Walls with certain impotent people at first, in scorn of David's attempt. For they that had held their City about 400 years against all the Children of Israel, Jephtha, the Judge, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posselt himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embassadours and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other Concubines, and named more Wives, by whom he had ten Sons in Jerusalem, and by his former Wives, he had six in Hebron, where he reigned 7 years.

The Philistines hearing that David was now anointed King, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountered by David at two several times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giant's, they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalpezzim.

Then David assembled 30000 choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibea to the City of David; which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the Son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the City with music, dances, and signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Heruon Micah derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncircumcised as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his Servants, namely, that he forgot his regal dignity both, in apparel and behaviour, and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and streets: not that the disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though the made it the colour of her derision; but rather the abundant grief, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her Father and Brethren, out of whose veins she conceived that the Son of Jehoi had built this his greatness: together with the many new Wives and Concubines embraced, since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despicable terms, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan, for the building of the Temple or House of God, but was forbidden it, because he was a Man of War, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all Israel homicide; having threatened, not in vain, that he would require the Blood of a Man, at the hand of a Man and Beast. The Wars which David had made were just, and the Blood therein shed was of the Enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the Foundation of that Holy Temple, because it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by blood-shed and terror of their Wars, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodness, or seek the bloodless promises by their Saviour unto the peace-makers. Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent to well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne that should be established in his Seed.

SECT. V.

The overthrow of the Philistines and Moabites.

Soon after this, David overthrew the Philistines, which made them altogether powerless, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in hall. For it is written, Accept sennam Amara & maam Philisthina, which place, our English Genes converts in these words, And David took the bride of bondage out of the hands of the Philistines. The Latin of Jerome giveth another and a better sense; for that bride of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genes hath it in the marginal note. This City of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casarea, set on the frontier of Palestina, at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thence their retreat in all their invasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier Town of equal strength to the Philistines on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof and of the word Gath is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 13. This explication is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro, 18.

There was no Nation bordering the Jews that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistines did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but infused them to come down into their territory, for all iron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David, were furnished free from paying tribute to the Philistines. After this he gave them four other overthrows; but the War of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbosheth the head of whose spear weighed 300 shekels of Brass, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistin, whereupon the Counsellors and Captains of David (let the light of Israel might by his loss be quenched) vowed that he should meet thereon hazard himself in any battle. The first of these three encounters and overthrow of the Philistines was at Gath, a place near Gaza, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assisted of the Philistines by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity he sought succour, and left his Parents with him in trust. But where it were to be King or no, it is not known. The Rabbins feign that Moab slew those kinfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Sams time; but questionless David well knew how that Nation had been always enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them, that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23 of Dut, God commanded Israel, not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to Till the Ground. This victory obtained, he led his Army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Haddadezer the Son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the Holy Land: to which I refer the Reader.

SECT. VI.

The War which David made upon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text: David suavit ad Haddadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the River Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Haddadezer, it is not agreed upon. Joins thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tul oppressed by Haddadezer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprise towards Euphrates, he was in far better case to have proceeded after his victory than before, seeing that (Haddadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back either to pursue him, or to take victuals and supplies from him, or to the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to pass through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyra, his Army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both Horse and Chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian Army; not bending his course towards the River Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whence it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damscofer, and of Damascus whereof that region is so called, hearing that Haddadezer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own Country which adjoined to Syria Zoba of Haddadezer, sent for an Army of Arames or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appears, came too late for Haddadezer, and too soon for themselves for these perished of those supplies. 20000. This King of Damascus, Josphus (out of Niebolus, an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family, as also those other Adads were which now began to grow up in greatness, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: having also sacked the adjoining Cities of Beath, and Borathi, belonging to Haddadezer, of which Cities Paltayim calleth Beath, Tania: and Borathi he nameth Burathana, Toba or Thoi, whose County of Hamath joynted to Haddadezer (as in the description of the Holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his Son Joram to congratulate this success of David, partly because he had War with Haddadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of Gold, Silver, and Brass: all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoils of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Ysaie translated the wordes (Cypres aureus) by Uniones, as if all the parts of the Targets were not of Gold, but the Boles only. The Septuagint call them Bracelets: Aquila, Golden Chains. But because Roboam made shields of Brass in place of shields of Haddadezer, as such time as Shibac the Egyptian sack'd the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Haddadezer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hannum, King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his Fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nabash, the Father of Hannum. But this Ammonite being illadvised, and over jealous of his estate, used David's Messengers to barbarously, and contemptuously (as he thereby drew a War upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aids purchased, could put off or sustain. For notwithstanding that he had waged three and thirty thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates, to wit, of the Vassalls of Haddadezer twenty thousand, and of Maachab and Israhel thirteen thousand (for which he disbursed a thousand Talents of Silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites were by Joab and his Brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that which it was written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the Walls, the other in their deserts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Haddadezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Army, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that he could levy out of Misopotamia: who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest Men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Army in Palmirena, nor yet entered into Arabia: so that, at Helma a place no less distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the South-West. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest off journey that ever he had) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. He also possit himself of Thadmor or Palmirena, which Solomon afterward strongly fortified: and this City was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the River Euphrates. So had he two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000 Horsemen, and 700 Chariots, together with Sobach General of their Army. The Chronicles call these 40000 Souldiers, footmen, and so Junier convertit, and so it is very probable. For the Army of Israel consisting of Footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000 Horsemen, except they quitted their Horse and fought on Foot. So are the Chariots taken in this Battel, numbered at 7000 in the first of Chronicles the ninth: in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as their dyed of the Syrians in this War against David, before he forc'd them to tribute, 100000 Footmen, besides all their Horsemen and waggons, and besides all those that Joab slew; when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Robabah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adams in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the fall end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Misopotamians, from the party and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forage and destroy their territory, and to besiege Robabah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possit. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of Gold, garnished with precious Stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoil of the City. And though David stayed at Jerusalem, following the War of Uriah his Wife, till such time as the City was brought to extremity, and ready to be entered: yet Joab in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrival. To the People he used extreme rigour (if we may so call it, being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with Harrows, some he sawd alunder, others he cast into burning Kilns, in which he baked Tyle and Brick.

SECT. VII.

Of Davids troubles in his reign and of his forces.

As victory begeth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself, the Giver of all goodnes: so did these changes, in the fortunate state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commandments: For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom he was wont to ask counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For he was not only fatisfied to take Uriah's Wife from him, and to use her by stealth: but he imbroidered his adultery with Uriah's slaughter, giving order to his trusty Servant Joab to murder him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Robbah, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best Sergeants and Souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happiness, and his days then to come, were filled with joys and woe interchangeable, his trodden-down sorrows began again to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witnesses of David: own Mouth mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekites, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own error in the poison of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many: He then vowed to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although he pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following: Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, &c. He slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adultery which he begot on Bethsabee. Secondly, his own son Amnon, being in love with his half sister Tamar, by the advice of his counsellor-german the son of Shimeah, David's brother, possit her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despitel manner. Two years after which he begot on Bethsabee, Abishalom caused him to be murdered at the feast of his sheep-shearing: not perchance in revenge of Tamar's ravishment alone: but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdom, in which, because he could not in any fort be advanced by Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly afflicted by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despoiled her: the other after a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai King of Goffur, near Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abishalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his son) was brought again, first to the Kings favour, and then to his preference: he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to win men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction threatened by the Lord as a punishment of David's sin.

The company which Abishalom gathered at the first were but 200 men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Abishalom repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, and was by the people (who's hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted for a King, that David doubting to be set upon the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own City of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surpris: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600 of his guard, and few else. The Priests he left in Jerusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of the things that chanced to whom he directed Hophai his trusty friend, and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsels of Abishalom's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Abishalom, a revolting Counsellor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred David prosperly had smothered, but his adversity lightened) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most despitfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his son Solomon, Abishalom being now possit of Jerusalem, was advised by Abishalom to use his fathers concubines in some public place, as if Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being persuaded, they then redely adhered to Abishalom and his cause, without fear of being up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsel) Abishalom indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction, who most of all other inflamed Abishalom against his Father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the Sun: for thou didst it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sun. He also gave advice to Abishalom, that himself with an Army of 12000 men might be employed at the instilling been imbrued by Abishalom, had not Hophai David's faithful servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: persuading Abishalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Abishalom to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which David valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abishalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, as if God, the loss of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Abishalom rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shew'd) the success which followed, dispos'd of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Abishalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprise against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possit himself King of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Judah: the fame wherein Isobab himself in the war against David after Saul's death feared himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nabash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the fame which Joseph calleth Shiphai. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hannum overthrown: in thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to David assistance Mehir of Lodbar, Guardian in former times to Mephibosheth, and among others Barekiah the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Abishalom prepared to fight: Abishalom made Amasa Commander of the Army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David: an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, persuaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abishalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by nature, remembered that Abishalom had lately dispos'd of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Abishalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not persuade the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with his own servants dispatch him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living: and tearing

That this civil War lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter : though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dur'd longer : and therefore the matter reiteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbins conceive that Ishbosheth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the War as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Ishbosheth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousy between him and Ishbosheth for Saul's Concubine : neither did the death of Ishbosheth instantly follow : but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth certainly appear.

SECT. III.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Ishbosheth by Rechab and Baanah.

Abner reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered : for Joab could not endure a companion in David's Favour, and in the commandment of his force : which he was grown so powerful, as David dur'd not to call him to account : for thus much he confiteth of himself, I am his day work, and these Men, the Sons of Zeruiah, be too hard for me. In this David complained after Abner's death : and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation : *Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house : and let them be subject to Ulcers, to the leprosie, to lameness, to the sword, and to poverty, &c.* For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have endangered David's estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischief therefore David openly bewailed, to that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being General of the Men of War, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were fain to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, it once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversity : wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterwards flew Amsai his own kinsman, and the Kings, upon the same quarrel, taking it in high disdain to him joined with himself as Captain of the host of Juda : much less could he brook a superior : and such a one as had slain his Brother, and been beaten himself in Battle. But however Joab did hate or dislike Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great Man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming that he dyed not like a Fool, nor a Man vanquished : But as a Man fallen by force wicked Men, so (saith he) didst thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and virtue in him, whom a stronger hand destroyed unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Ishbosheth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of this estate, and with him all Israel were posset with great fear : in so much as two of Ishbosheth's own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Ishbosheth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekites lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Ishbosheth, being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent.

SECT. IV.

Of the flourishing time of David's Kingdom, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrows given to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

When David was now established in the Kingdom, his first enterprise was upon the Philistines, who in denision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as it is thought) manned their Walls with the blind and lame of their City : which David soon after entered, all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion, of which was afterward the City of David, he became Lord of Jerusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Joshua : and after them almost 400 years. There are who expound this place, otherwise : Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebusites : others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Jacob : the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angels, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self, I take it with Josephus, that they armed their Walls with certain impotent people at first, in fear of David's attempt. For they that had held their City about 400 years against all the Children of Israel, Philistines, the Jebusites, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posset himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embassadors and presents from Hiram King of Tyre : he entertained divers other Concubines, and married more Wives, by whom he had ten Sons in Jerusalem, and by his former Wives, he had six in Hebron, where he reigned 7 years.

The Philistines hearing that David was now anointed King, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountered by David at two several times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrowen. After which he called the place Bazephataim.

Then David assembled 30000 choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibeon to the City of David : which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzab the Son of Abinadab, whom the Lord flew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to flay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the City with sacrifice, music, and dances, and signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, that he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his Servants, namely, that he forgot his regal dignity both, in apparel and behaviour, and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and streets : not that the disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though he made it the colour of her derision : but rather the abundant grief, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband husband to whom he was delivered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her Father and Brethren, out of whose ruins he conceived that the Son of Israh had built this his greatness : together with the many new Wives and Concubines embraced, since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despitul terms, for which she remained barren to her death.

This David, confuted with the Prophet Nathan, for the building of the Temple or House of God, but was forbidden it, because he was a Man of War, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide : having threatened, not in vain, that he would require the Blood of a Man, at the hand of a Man and Beast. The Wars which David had made were just, and the Blood therein shed was of the Enemies of God, and his Church : yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the Foundation of that Holy Temple, hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by idolatry and terror of their Gods, to make themselves in greater like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride : not caring to imitate his mercy and goodness, or seek the blessings promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers. Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne that should be established in his Seed.

SECT. V.

The overthrow of the Philistines and Mosabites.

Soon after this, David overthrowed the Philistines, which made them altogether powerless, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in half. For it is written, *Except from Ammar it was not Philistines which place, our English Genevies converts in their words, And David took the bridge of bondage out of the hands of the Philistines.* The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sense : for that bridle of Ammar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and to the Genevies hath it in the marginal note. This City of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsarea, set on the frontier of Palestina, at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thercinto their retreat in all their invasions, which being taken by David and demolished ; there was left no such frontier Town of equal strength to the Philistines on that part. The hill whereon Geth stood, the Hebrews call Amma, whereout of the word Gur is made Ammar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 15. This explication is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro, 18.

There was no Nation bordering the Jews that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistines did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but inforced them to come down into their territory, for all iron work whatsoever they needed : so as the Israelites till this time of David, were fain to come from paying tribute to the Philistines.

After this, he gave them four other overthrows, but the War of the Mosabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was endangered by Ishbi-benub, the head of whose spear weighed 300 shekels of Brass, which made nine pound three quarters of our poizes : at which time Abishai succoured David, and flew the Philistim, whereupon the Councillores and Captains of David (left the light of Iff at night by his loss he quizzed) vowed that he should not be thenceforth hazzard himself in any battel. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistines was at Gath, a place near Geth, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistines by the taking of Geth, he invaded Mosab, from whence notwithstanding in his adversity he fought succour, and left his Parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not known.

The Rabbins feign that Mosab lived those kindsthis of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time : but questionless David well knew how that Nation had been always enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them, that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23 of Deut, God commanded Israel, not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Mosabites : which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to Till the Ground. This victory obtained, he led his Army by the border of Ammun towards Syria Zobib, the region of Haddadezer the Son of Reobek King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the Holy Land : to which I refer the Reader.

SECT. VI.

The War which David made upon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text : David juste assi Haddadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the River Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Haddadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Zobib oppressed by Haddadezer, overthrowed the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrians, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprise towards Euphrates, he was in far better case to have proceeded after his victory than before, seeing that (Haddadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back either to pursue him, or to take victuals and supplies from him, or to the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to pass through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmeyra, his Army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all : He had now both Horse and Chariots good force to carry his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after he had twice overthrowen the Syrians Aramites, not bending his course towards the River Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrians, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his borders, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascus, and of Damascus whereof that region is so called, hearing that Haddadezer was overthrowen by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own Country which adjoynd to Syria Zobib of Haddadezer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour : but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Haddadezer, and too soon for themselves for their perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus (out of Niebolus, an ancient Historian) callith Adad, who was also of the same name and family, as also those other Adads were, which now began to grow up in

in greatness, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: having also sacked the adjoining Cities of Betah, and Berath, belonging to Hadadezer, of which Cities Psalm calleth Beth Lathai; and Berath he nameth Barathaim, Telusur (that, whose County of Hamath joined to Hadadezer. Thus the description of the Holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his Son Ioram to congratulate this success of David: partly because he had War with Hadadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of Gold, Silver, and Brass, all which, together with the golden shields of the Ammonites, and the best of all the spoils of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Joab translated the wordes (Chypus aureus) by Umbones, as if all the parts of the Targets were not of Gold, but the Bosses only. The Septuagint call them Bracelets: Aquila, Golden Chains. But because Robam made shields of Brass in place of those of Hadadezer, as such time as Shebazi the Egyptian sick'd the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Hadadezer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Haman, King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his Fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nabab, the Father of Haman. But this Ammonite being illadvised, and over jealous of his estate, used David's Messengers barbarously, and contemptuously, by curtailling their Beards, and their Garments, as he thereby drew a War upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aids purchased, could put off or sustain. For notwithstanding that he had waged three and thirty thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates to wit, of the Vassals of Hadadezer twenty thousand, and of Machab and Ishob thirteen thousand (for which he disbursed a thousand Talents of Silver) yet all these great armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites were by Joab and his Brother Abishai castly broken and put to ruine: and that without any great loss or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Ammonites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the Walls, the other in their deserts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Hadadezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Army, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that he could levy out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helon, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest Men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Army in Palmyrena, not yet entered into Arabia to wit, at Helon a place no less distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the South-West. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest off journey that ever he had) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. He also possit himself of *Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Solomon afterward strongly fortified; and this City was but one dayes journey from Helon, and the River Euphrates. So had he two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000 Horsemen, and 700 Chariots, together with Shobach General of their Army. The Chronicles call these 40000 Souldiers, footmen, and so Joab convertit, and so it is very probable. For the Army of Israel consisting of Footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000 Horsemen, except they quitted their Horse and fought on Foot. So are the Chariots taken in this Battle, numbered at 7000 in the first of Chronicles the ninth: in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as their dyed of the Syrians in this War against David, before he forc'd them to tribute, 100000 Footmen, besides all those that Joab slew; when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adas in following ages gave strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the party and confederacy of Ammon: He sent our Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forage and destroy their territory, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possit. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of Gold, garnished with precious Stones, David let on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoil of the City. And though David layed at Jerusalem, following the War of Uriah his Wife, till such time as the City was brought to extremity, and ready to be entered: yet Joab in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrival. To the People he used extrem rigor (if we may call it, being exercised against heathen Idolaters), for some of them he tare with Harrows, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning Kills, in which he baked Tyle and Brick.

SECT. VII.

Of Davids troubles in his reign and of his forces.

But as worldly begetteth security, and our present victory breedeth a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the Giver of all goodnes: so did these changes, in the fortunate state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his Laws and Commandments: For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom he was wont to ask counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For he was not only fatisfied to take Uriah's Wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but he embrodered his adultery with Uriah's slaughter, giving order to his truly Servant Joab to march him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabbah, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best Servants and Souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happiness, and his days then to come, were filled with joys and woes interchangeable, his trodden-down forrows began to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witnesses of David's own Mouth of the history of the World.

mouth against him, as David himselfe did against the Amalekites, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own error in the person of another, to wit, of him that took in the poor mans life, that had none else, the better being Lord of many; He then vowed to die the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet he delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following: Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adultery which he begot on Bophia. Secondly, his own son Amnon, being in love with his half sister Tamar, by the advice of his confederate, the son of Shimeah, David's brother, possit her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careles and deplorable manner. Two years after which foul and incestuous act, Abshalon caused him to be murdered at the feast of his sheep-shearing: not perchance in revenge of Tamar's ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdom, in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his deflection. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despised her: the other brother a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai King of Gether, near Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abshalon by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his son) was brought against, first to the Kings favour, and then to his preference; he began insensibly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction threatened by the Lord as a punishment of Davids sin.

The company which Abshalon gathered at the first were but 200 men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Helon, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Abshalon repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted for a King, that David doubting to be set upon the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own City of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surpris: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600 of his guard, and few else. The Priests he left in Jerusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced: to whom he directed Huihai his truly friend, and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsels of Abshalon's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Abshalon, a revolting Counsellour, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Abshalon: the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Davids prosperity had quenched, but his adversity illighted) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most delightfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Abshalon to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his son Solomon. Abshalon being now possit of Jerusalem, was advised by Achisholai to use his father's concubines in some such publick place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they sought then resolutely adhere to Abshalon and his cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation betwixt them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsel) Achisholai indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing, that this rebellion might take end in his deflection, who most of all other inflamed Abshalon against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbours, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the Sun: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sun. He also gave advice to Abshalon, that himself with an Army of raccoo men might be employed at the instant for the impairing of David: which had willingly been suggested by Abshalon, had not Huihai Davids faithful servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Abshalon that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which Davids valor and those of his attendants might either endanger or resist. This delay in Abshalon, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after Gods will, the loss of one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achisholai rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsok both the party and the care of Abshalon, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprise against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the fame wherein Ishobai himself in the war against David after Sauls death feared himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nahab, the Ammonite, whom David loved, the fame which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Haman, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hamans overthrow: in thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Davids assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephobosh, and among others Barzilai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Abshalon prepared to fight: Abshalon made Amasa Commander of the Army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, persuaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Itai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abshalon, but Joab, besides that he was very cruel by nature, remembered that Abshalon had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Abshalon hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with his own servants dispatched him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Abisalom, he embraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a son, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he so hid himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the City, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather desired death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, persuaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to throw himself to the Army. For first, he told him that he had discontenanced his faithful servants, who had that day preferred his life: inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not only not to acknowledge to great a love and constancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Abisalom at an easy rate. Secondly, he urged, that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies, and hated his friends: and that it witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithful servants, but would have joyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom lived, than in the victory by their faithful deeds and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himself publicly to his men of war, that they would all at one time rebel and abandon him: concluding with this fearful threatening, And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the City among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amsai, who commanded the Army of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship: the fame which Abisalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amsai were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remission was but external, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had falsely accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Bazaiiah the Gileadite, his late liberal host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his service done him: who excusing himself by his age, appointed his son Chishum to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Army brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichai, a Benjamite, of the faction of the house of Saul: finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemed that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare him a good affection to the issues of their first King. David impliedly his reconciled Captain Amsai, to give him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceived that Amsai had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the Army within three days, which he foretold: but being onward on his way, Abisai, Joab's brother, was sent after him, with David's guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amsai near Gibion, pretending to embrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no less jealous of Amsai than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba: and finding him inclosed in Ahal, assaulted the City with that fury, that the Citizens by the persecutions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he returned his Army to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Saul's sons or kinsmen to the Gibonites, whom those Citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reason of Saul and his house: to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanely, to rid himself of Saul's line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered: only he spared Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and vow to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sons of Rizpah, whom she bore unto Saul, and the five sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibonites: Junius calls this Michol the sister of her that was David's wife, the whom Saul married to Pharai: but Michol here named, had Adriel for her husband: the fame which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David when he slew Goliath in the Valley Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane respect in the delivery of her children, it is only known to God.

Now where the Genez nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipse or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the fame kindred, as in the 19th verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliath, whose spear was weighty as a Wexers beam, when as by the same eclipses it must be understood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Saul's children God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against foreign enemies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Captains of thousands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in war. Over these were six Colonels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. The Colonels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon meer consideration of their virtue. For Abisai the brother of Joab, who in the war against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded half the army, could not attain to the honour of the first rank, but was fain to rest contented with being principal of the three

Colonels

Colonels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness of blood unto the King, the flourishing estate of his own house, and his well approved services. All these Colonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readiness for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Saul's time, and been hardened with his adventures. Others there were very many, and principal men in their several Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul: but these Captains and Colonels (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings Forces, make up the number of 37,) were the special men of War, and reckoned as David's Worthies. The long reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent men of War, so may it probably be guessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sons of Zerai, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Solomon, who wanted his brother Abisai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that he had reigned now 33 years or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Solomon in his Fathers Throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbing the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Joab, with other Captains of his Army, who after nine months and twenty days travel, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin, whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof, five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet God he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased: to wit, seven Years Famine; three Months War, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies: or a general pestilence to last three days: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70 thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men: whereof he giveth this divine reason, For his mercies are great.

SECT. VIII.

Of the last acts of David: Adonijahs faction; the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

Lastly, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of Women, he was yet advised to lie in the arms of a young and well-complexioned Maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bedrid, Adonijah his eldest son (Amnon and Abisalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manfully to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdom after his Father. For being the eldest now living of David's sons, and a man of goodly personage, Solomon yet young, and born of a Mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by Saint Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without reluctance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bersabee the Mother of Solomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Solomon, her son should reign after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and frowning her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling unto him Zadok the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Banaiab the Captain of his Guard gave charge and commission to anoint Solomon, and to fit him with one the Mule wheron himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Solomon attended, and throngly guided by the ordinary and choice men of War, the Cherubims, and Pelabiers, threw himself to the people. These things being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he hid by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Solomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two special cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts: the one concerning the peace of the Land, which might be disturbed by some Rebellion against Solomon: the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the several Tribes, all the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; and who did repair unto Jerusalem.

In this Assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Hercia he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdom was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Joab in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself it was pleased to make choice of him among all his Fathers sons. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Solomon by name to be his Successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his son to conform themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this Work of the Lords house, which Solomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the pattern of the Work, according to the form which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brass, iron, and Jewels, heartily rejoicing in the advancement of so religious a Work. This business being so well dispatched, a solemn Feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Solomon was again anointed King, and received Calvary of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sons of King David. Solomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, did exhort his son to execute the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprises, he uttered these mighty words: Joab

1 King. 2. lead to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which GOD failed the execution, and profusely of his illures. For this done (saith GOD himself) Thou shalt not want one of thy Posterity to sit upon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he advised him concerning Joab; who out of doubt had served David from the first advent of Joab down to the last of his Wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saying that he failed himself to Abiathar (his malice yet living) and thereby vexed him in his rebellion. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, so was it his will that Joab should drink of the same cup, whereof he had enticed other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himself had unjustly trusted others withall. Qui gladio percutit, gladio perbit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amasa their lives, laying against the one the presence only of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slain in the time of War, and could not avoid him: against the other but a mere jealousy of his growing glory in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himself that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him, or supplant him, yet GOD (denying the policies of wicked men) raised up Boaz the son of Jehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary: and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cause to Joab against Abner, that he slew the Captains of the Host of Israel, and that the blood of War in peace; and to this apparent and just cause, it is not improbable that David remembered the ill affection of Joab towards Solomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, of which in these words he put his son Solomon in mind: *Thou knowest also what Joab the son of Serviah did to me, &c.* Now whether this was meant by the killing of Abner, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words used to him when he mourned the publishing of David's Letter unto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Solomon as defended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of War do oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their malices cannot miss them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrowen many a worthy man, otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Solomon to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time David lived, yet being dull in the grave, he flew him by the hand of Solomon his son. Hence it knoweth that King Henry the seventh of England had his putting, when he gave order to Henry the Eighth to execute Pool as soon as himself was buried, having made promise to the King of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab's yield unto Solomon any less great profit or advantage as he hoped for. For he found a young Adid of Idumea, and Rezin of Damascus to vex him; as who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to entrap upon Solomon, hearing that David slept with his Father's, and that Joab the Captain of the Host was dead. Now when David had reigned in all forty Years, as we, in Hebrew even Years, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces, he far exceeded all other men, as putting his honour far apart, he was said by God himself to be a man according to his own heart. The Psalms which he wrote, witness his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Jerom to Paulinus: David Simonides asoter, Pindarus, & Alceus, Ptoleus, quoque Catullus, & Sarcus, Christianus lra postulat, & in delatodibus Psalms ab inferioris suscitavit reversionem; David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alceus, Horace, Catullus and Sarcus, he playeth Christ on his Harp, and on a never-fading Psalter he causeth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightly and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Psalms, saith Clement, was divided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekiel: but whether all the Psalms were written by David, it is diversely disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers Authors answering, the titles of the several Psalms, as Moses, Solomon, and thereto heretofore named; and that only 73 Psalms were composed by David himself; namely, those which are intitled psalm David. For the 50 and the 72 with psalm that follow, are belowned on Asaph the son of Berachiah, eleven other on the sons of Korah and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 84 and the 109 following, and so they are intitled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the Vulgar and Septuagint (three except) file them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalms which David wrote not. Sixti, Senesius nameth as tolews; Solomon, Moses, (when Aben Ezra, contrary to Jerom, maketh one of David's fingers) Asaph, Ethan-Ezaias, Ethan, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But S. S. Cyrillus makes David the sole Author of all the 118 Psalms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms only to David, which are over-written psalm David, and the rest intitled psalm David, to others, this opinion (saith he) Ysaie Evangelica, Salvatoris ipsius refutator, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christiano discit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109 ps incipit, Dixit Dominus Dominus meus, Se de dextera meo, &c. The voice of the Gospel respects this opinion, whereto saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109 Psalm begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his Testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron, 29. vers. 19. For the several parts of the books of Samuel which treat chiefly of David, were, as it seems, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Mansueti hath an opinion, that the Trojan during the time of the siege fought for succour by David, and that he stayed Neuter in that War. But it seemeth that Mansueti did miscake the time of twixt David and the Trojan War. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abraham and Samson Judges of Israel, about the World's years 2848, and David died in the year 2591.

SECT.

SECT. IX.

Of the Treasures of David and Solomon.

His Treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22 of the first of Chronicles, that he left Solomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of Gold, and a thousand thousand talents of Silver, and of Brass and Iron of all weight, which is more than any King the World possit besides himself, and his Son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty and three cart-load, and a third of a cart-load of Silver, allowing two thousand weight of Silver, or six thousand pound tending to every cart-load, besides therefore and fifteen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars they were followed by such volunteers as the several tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possit by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiss to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amass up such mighty treasures. For though possibly he it felt a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the utmostmost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Enchirius in his book and in chapter de Preparatione Evangelica, cited the words of Jeremias, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melania (or as Vallapandus corrects it, Achania) a City of Arabia, and from thence sent Men to dig for Gold in the Island Uphre, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Epulomus in this place of Enchirius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Island was in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Epulomus, they brought Gold into Jury, Finida 1.4. de Rebus Solomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and ceteris this testimony of Epulomus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitful valleys near Jordan in Thracanitis and Bafan, and the belt of Spiza, and other countries bordering the Eufrates. These domains belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his Wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 2 Chro. 17. that Jahobab was over his treasures in the Field, in the Villages, in the Cities, in the Towns: that Ezer was over the labourers that tilled his ground, Simeon over the Vineyards, and Sabdi over the flocks of the Wine: Basai Hanan over the Olive trees, and Josh over the flocks of the Oyle: also that he had herdsmen that had charge over his Cattel, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Affes. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattel, the ancient Kings every where held both before and after David's time. For we read of Pharaoh, that he spake to Joseph to appoint some of his Brethren, or of their Servants, to be rulers over his Cattel. We read of Ugria, that the love of husbandry had much Cattel Land ploughmen, and the Res of Vincis his wife we read in it all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks: whereto it were needful to cite Agges and Almanus, whereto for other examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not employed in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of great professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To such profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tobu and others) we may add the great spoils which he found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: all the dead money which was gathered prolegem capitum: by the law of captivation, or dead money, every Man rich or poor paying half a tale of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous sum in that Kingdom: whereto one thousand thousand five hundred and fifty thousand lighting Men were numbered by Joab. Now although this law of captivation be thought by some very learned, not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confest is against the Hebrew explications) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practice. And by these means might he be able to leave those huge treasures to Solomon. Yet it may seem that of this great mass of Gold and Silver left by David, the least part was his own in private; and so will appear the less wonderful that he left so much. Or his own liberality we find, that he gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of Gold, and seven thousand talents of Silver: a great sum, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continual increase, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshua. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expenses, and maintained the Priests and Levites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in War. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the Soldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half: whereby all the Country received benefit of the Victory, yet so, that the Soldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fifty, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred of that which was given to the Soldiers: namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand Women being taken, the Army had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Army, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute: Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the less for that the Army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Soldier; but when it consisted of many hundreds, they who remaining at home were faint under the ordinary manner of travel in domestic affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was altways certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some special commandment, as when all the Gold, and Silver, and other metals found in Jericho, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and people, as when after the Victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one Man, all Jewels, Bracelets, Earrings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntary presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and trodden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasuries robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many Victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasury was not defrauded of the due proportion, it is evident, seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in War, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former Victory had purchased, those of Joab perhaps excepted: but these vast sums of an hundred thousand Talents of Silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in his former Ages, than to have been the mere fruits of his own industry.

Now concerning the riches of Solomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues with his tributes, 666 Talents of Gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also fix rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his Ships performed that Voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the twentieth year of his reign, and ruled forty years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now manured to his hands; all the Arabians his borders, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascus, of Palmyra, of Timae; all of Idumea, Mob, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, with whom the Perizzites, Hivites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished though subdued.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after 30 years reign, and 70 years of life, died in a good age, full of days, riches, and honour, and was buried in the City of David. It is written by Joseph that there was hid in David's Tomb a marvellous quantity of treasures, inasmuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanee, or race of Macechabe, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding mass of Gold and Silver therein. And it was an ancient custom to bury treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they inscribed themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Solomon did bury so much treasure in his Fathers grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise or which were left unto him: were it not withal considered that his want of money grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of burial. Yet the Monuments of these Kings, as (by relation of the Duke of Ulcia) they remained within these thirty years, and are like to remain still, are able to make report credible of the cost bestowed upon them.

SECT. X.

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other Contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They defended of Caslim, who, according to L. I. lib. 1. p. 19. Idor and Josephus, was one of the Sons of Misram, 3. p. 1. 3. and was furnished Philistin, as Ejus was furnished Edom, and Joab Israel. There were of them five Cities or petty Principalities, namely, Azotus or Alod, Gaza or Azaph, Ascalon, Gethor Gath, and Accaron, 1 Sam. 6. It seemeth that Caslim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abraham's Wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of Famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar, in the border of Idumea; which Abimelech, fancied Isaac's Wife, as his Father had done Sara. Gen. 16.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocracy. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Ashur be named King of Gath, 1 Sam. 18. the fame to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After whom we read of another Abimelech who lived with Solomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive Servant, what time the seeking of his Servant was the loss of his life. Jeremy the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palistin or Philistin. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. Thereof the Wars of the Philistims are remembered in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Siliv King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have lived till the year of Italy thirty years. And about his fourteenth year Cadmus the first King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those who being called after Medon, Minotides, without regal name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of Sovereignty, but in honour of Cadmus only. For when the Grecians of Doris, a region between Phocis, and the mountain of Oeta, sought counsel from the Oracle, for their success in the Wars against the Athenians, it was answered, that then and doubtless all the riches which he got otherwise or which were left unto him: were it not withal considered that his want of money grew from such living. Cadmus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own Forces and putting on the habit of a common Soldier, entered the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first he encountered, was himself forthwith cut in pieces. He expelled the 31 King of Assyria, which others account but the 30 began to rule that Empire, about the 13 year of David, and held it 38 years.

Near the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heracleidae, the Son of Eurhythmus in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heracleidae in Lacedemon: in honour of which Agis, his Successors were called Agidae, for many years after. He restored the Lacedaemonians to their former liberty: he overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery: whereof it came, that all the Messians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helots.

In like sort from the Selavici came the Word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the Country of Byzicia, and made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by a new name, Slaves which is in their language Glorigus. But in aftertimes (that warmer Climate having thawed their Northern hardiness, and not ripened their Wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many Countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later about the 23 year of David, and say that Achisrathus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Enfichus calls Labites, and sets him in the 13 year of Solomon.

In the tenth year of Achisrathus, Andronicus the third Son of Cadmus, assisted by the Iones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adjoining of the Isle of Samos to his Territory, was slain by the Carians, whose Country he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetis, his armed Statue being set over him. Strabo reports that after Andronicus had subdued the Ionians (the next Province to Ephesus on the sea-coast of Asia the less) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Aeolians, which joyneth to Ionis: and that his posterity governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythrae by the name of Basilides in Strabo's own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponnesus, I have *spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heracleidae into Peloponnesus, wherein, with the Dorians, they expelled the Aeolians, and inhabited their places in that Land: though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heracleidae 100 years.

The City of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425 foot, and 220 in breadth, sustained with 127 pillars of marble, of 70 foot high: whereof 27 were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polished, the work being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnossus. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop: to whom and to the Ephesians, St. Paul wrote his Epistle so entitled. The other City possess by Andronicus in Asia, was also universally spoken of by reason of Sylva's, furnished Erythrae, who lived 740 years before Christ was born. St. Augustine avoweth that a Roman Proconsul buried him in an ancient Grecopoly certain verses of this Prophetess, which began (as St. Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Jesus Christus Dei Filius, Salvator; Jesus Christi Son of God, the Saviour.

About the time that Joab besieged Rabbi in Mosh, Vaphor began to govern in Aegypt, the same that was Father in law to Solomon whose Epistles to Solomon, and his to Vaphor, are remembered by Enfichus out of Polemon. In the 21 of David, was the City of Magnesia in Asia the less founded, the same which is situated upon the River Meander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this Territory are the best herds of the Leifer Asi breed, whence Linus:

Et Magnetis equis, Moxa goss cognovit arvis.

About the same time Cunus in Campania, was built by the Inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cameanus of Aeolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the City. Of this Cunus was Ephor the famous Scholar of Isochares.

Enfichus and Cassidor 1 and the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31 year of David, but much mistaken. For the Father of Dido was Mitros the Son of Badezus, brother to Jezebel, who married Achab King of Israel: and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were walled, about 45 years.

In this time also Acahus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Cadmus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracy of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Aeolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oristes, possessed the City and Island of Thebes about this time. In the 32 year of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyze, according to Josephus, who con- Ant. 8. 2. fesseth in his twelfth year Solomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Josephus to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely as he knew not how at all to ease any account. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent Messengers and Cedars unto David, soon after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the beginning of David's reign over Israel, when as yet he had reigned only seven years in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30 years before Solomon's unless more credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plain words of the Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Solomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

C H A P. XVIII.

OF SOLOMON.

S E C T. I.

Of the establishing of Solomon: of birth-right, and the cause of Adonijah's death, and of Solomon's wisdom.

SOLOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, began to reign over Judah and Israel, in the year of the World 2991. He was called Solomon by the appointment of God: he was also called Jedidias, or Theophilus by Nathan, because the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Solomon's anointing, dispatched Embassadors towards him, congratulating his establishment: a custom between princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like sort salute Hannum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Solomon was in blood, though his reign were peaceable. For soon after David's death, he caused his Brother Adonijah to be slain by Benaiab the Son of Jehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah's desiring by Jerubbaa, that the young maid Abisag (which lay in David's bosom in his later days, to keep him warm) might be given to him. Whatsoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder Brother, and fought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Solomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wife, and he that fees but the claw may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Solomon, this motion of Adonijah, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had been Concubines of a King, might not after be touched by a King: whence Adonijah's wife Adisalom to take his Fathers Concubines as part of the Royalty. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to him, but shut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it seems was the depth of Ishobab's quarrel against Abner, for having his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custom may seem too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters Wives. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen David to the shame of the nakedness of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marry with her that was always present with David in his later days, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Solomon. There may be divers further occasions, as either that he would learn fish things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would persuade her to forge some strange tale about David's last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Solomon.

As for the right of an elder Brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customs of the Jews: yet the Kings of the Jews were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else, what they pleased.

Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to use his paternal authority in transferring the birth-right to a younger Son: namely, of Jacob's disinheriting Reuben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joseph: of whom he made two Tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appears by the words of Bersabee and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirm, or that the refusal of the people had authority to frustrate the elder Brothers right to the Kingdom, it no where appears in the stories of the Jews. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no Man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of choosing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall choose.

But to proceed with the acts of Solomon: at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himself also of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had advised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah against him, but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had been the Ark of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, he took the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eschusim out of Euphrates calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, had him ask what he would at his hands: Solomon chose to have wisdom, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy self, nor hast thou asked the life of thine enemies, behold I have done according to thy words: in which we may inform our selves, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the conveying after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of self-love which is the root of all impiety: the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousness, which God abhorreth: To affect revenge, is as much as to take the Sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Solomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brethren slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God; but because Solomon desired Wisdom only, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule Men, it pleased God to give him wisdom that which he desired not. And I have given thee (saith God)

God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the Scripture testifies: though no doubt the chief excellency of Solomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how he judged the controversy between the two harlots.

S E C T. II.

Of Solomons building and glory.

HE then entered into league with Hiram King of Tyre, whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that he called Solomon his son, and charged him to build a house for the Lord of Tyre, so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Bebold, a son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an house for my Name. He began the work of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esion-gaber to trade for gold in the East-Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a work. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were putting to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the form and example was given by God himself) many learned men have written: as Salomon, Montanus, Ribera, Berradar, Azorius, Villalpando, Pineda, and others to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Solomon employed 30 thousand Carpenters, 10 thousand every month by course: he also used 50 thousand Malons in the Mountain, and 70 thousand labourers that bare burdens, which is conceived, he selected out of the Provinces, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his works: so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men: in which number the Sidonians, which were far more skilful in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring down the Cedars and Firs from Lebanon to the sea, and thence sent them in rafts to Jappe, or the next port to Jersusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain, that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the over-icers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of this Timber and Stone, Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of Wheat, and twenty measures of pure Oil yearly. Eschusim out of Euphrates in the ninth book of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copy of Solomons Letter to Suron (which was the name as Hiram and Hiram) King of Tyre, in these words:

REX Solomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phoenicie Regi, Amici, patris mei salutem. Scis me a Deo magno David patris nostri regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater precepit templum Dei, quod terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem preceptum: Scribo igitur, & peto a te ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittas velis.

KING Solomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phoenicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. Thou mayest understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God, which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

Suron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phoenicie Rex, Solomoni Regi salutem. Læti literis, gratias æque Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros, miniſtrosque ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te milia hominum atque agna, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex mare Judeæ, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Cur igitur in necessariis non egeam, & Templo Dei condico, ad non redunt.

Suron of Tyre, Sydon and Phoenicia King, to King Solomon greeting: When I read your Letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdom. And because you write that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you five thousand shand men, and a Master-builder, a Tyrian, born of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessities be provided for them; for, as you, when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus's time, as himself affirmeth, and to be seen (saith he) Tom in nigris quæ in Tyriorum antiquis, adhuc in ovis, æt in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different terms, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Solomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Euphrosim or Josephus set it down, but so, that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other.

The like Letter in effect Solomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Solomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Solomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Euphrosim in Eschusim, I do not had any such addition of magnus in Eschusim, in the last chapter of the ninth book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jews Antiquities: it being a vain title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, inasmuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean persons in respect of the great Herme the nut, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his nightgowns.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Solomon fortified Jersusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Jephthas's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: he built Bersheba, Gesar, and the Mills or munition of Jersusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in favour of Solomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gesar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their City. The place and Territory

Teritory he gave Solomon's Wife for a dowry. And it is probable, that because Solomon was then buied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entrusted his Tyber in law to rid him of their neighbours, which Pharab performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his son Rehoboam's time Shebass this man's successor did sack Jerusalem it self.

Solomon also built Mogido in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Balsh in Dan: also Thadmo, which may be either Palmyra Thamoon in the desert of Juda, or (as Jofeph thinks) Palmyra in the desert of Syria, which Palmyra, because it stood on the utmost border of Solomon's dominion in the Northeast of Libanus, and was from David's conquest when he wan Dimasur, it may seem that Solomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Jofeph calls this place Thadmo, by which name (saith he) given by Solomon, the Syrian as yet call it. Joam in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermob. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Solomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hiram for service: Solomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or near the upper Euphrate, but because they stood in an unfruitful and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

These towns, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, *Non quod gentis ibi habitarent: sed quia sub domine Regis Gentilis erat, Not that it was possit by the Gentiles (saith Nucleus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Solomon in the 21 Year fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syria Tobab, and established his tributes: the first and last war (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, putting from Thadmo to the North of Palmyra, and to the Deserts of Idumea, from whence he visited Ezionogabar and Eloth the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the Red Sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Mose.*

SECT. III.

Of Solomon's sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Solomon's riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Africk.

HERE Solomon prepared his Fleet of ships for India, with whom Hiram joyined in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrusians being of all other the most expert seamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet pass to the East-Indies, which was not far off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Molucces, a place exceeding rich in gold: witness the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Pera, do yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manila, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with less labour than they do in any one part of Pera, or new Spain.

The return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450 talents: whereof 30 talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420 talents, which make five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand crowns, came clear. And thus meet those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six talents of gold: that sum, as I take it, is not other receipts of Solomon's which were yearly, and which came to him, besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the Land of Ophir, that it is not Pera in America (as divers have thought) but a Country in the East-Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedily return to Jerusalem from the East-Indies, than in three years; and that Tharshis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the first book.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Beitica, would fain have Gades or Cadiz mist, in old times called Tarshis, which is the South-west corner of that Province, to be the Source from whence Solomon fetch his gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Country, and because of some faintness of found between Tharshis and Tarshis. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three Years ere they that took ship in the Red Sea, should return from the East-Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metal, and in their other traffic, and in their land-carriages between Jerusalem and the Red Sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that they have no need to make Solomon's men to go many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Solomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrusians which went with them could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean Sea; and for (besides many wonderful inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have elaped the troublesome land-carriage between Jerusalem and the Red Sea, through dry, desert, and the chieftly Countreys: and within 30 miles of Jerusalem at Joppe, or some other haven in Solomon's own Country, have laden and unladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis, in largeness greater than all Africk and Asia, being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean, hindered Solomon's ships from passing through the Straits of Gibraltar: for this, he allegeth Plato in Timæus. But that this calamity happened about Solomon's time, or that thereby the Straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterranean Sea; or that this indraught where the Sea meeteth most violently, and most effectually fourthly his channel, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stood; or that Solomon's ships being in the Red Sea, should neglect the golden Mines in the East-Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the Red Sea, than any in Spain) to seek gold at Cadye by the way of compassing Africa; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also therein Pera in the West, fourthly in the East-Indies, and inhabits some part thereof, as in Manilla, hindring in those parts no less less quantity of gold (the small territory which he there possessed) considered) than in Pera.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharshis the City of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterranean Sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three days swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterranean Seas, and through the Straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africk, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red Sea, that he might have perhaps some fix miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Nineve. This conceit he grounds only upon the ambiguity of the word Seip, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red Sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the Red Sea. But in Jonas c. 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giveth thus) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three days, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore further there is no necessity of this miracle, we find it back upon him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets: Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt mirabilia creandi, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda. Miracula non sunt multiplicanda nisi necesse sit, nec delictorum causa, nec signa ad placitum. Therefore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our story of Solomon.

The Queen of Saba's coming from far to Solomon (as seems from Arabia Felix, and not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Solomon's reciprocal magnificence, and his relieving of her difficult questions; those are set down at large in the Text. But herein Jofeph is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba, Nicanor, the successor (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Meneus the Founder of Mempbis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Solomon, the name of Pharab was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharabs after the father in law of Solomon. Yea, above three hundred Years after Solomon, Pharab Necbo slew Jofeph King of Juda.

It is also written of Solomon, that he kept in garbisons fourteen thousand Chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; that he spent in Country every day thirty measures of fine flower, threecore measures of wheat, one hundred tenth, besides fags and fag Deer, bugles and fowls four thousand stalls of horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of King's the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teams, and in every term ten horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was laid to be wiser than any man, yet than were Ethan the Ezerite, than Heman, Chilath, or than Darda; to which Junius addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezerack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezerite by Nation, Junius writes them, Athan, Aman, Chilath and Darda the sons of Heman. He spake three thousand Proverbs, and his Songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Solomon's were written and kept among the publick Records of Civil causes, and not Ecclesiastical, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods Book.

SECT. IV.

Of the fall of Solomon, and how long he lived.

NOW as he had plenty of all other things, so had he no scarcity of women. For besides his fifteen hundred Wives, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moth, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when he fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Asteroth of the Edomites, Milcom of Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moth.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his own servant, and one of the masters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tore from his son Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. Dan p. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100.
